HELEN MOIR

—OR—
LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE VOYAGE AND ITS TERMINATION.
Bridgenorth hung over her in speechless tenderness and pain, mitigated only by being mingled with rage. He had no intention of rickling his elbow, and resolved to keep watch over Helen's slumbers, but gradually and insensibly drowsiness came upon him, and he, too, sank into a sleep which for a time was deep and dreamless. Then it became confused, and full of noise and peril. He thought he was in Australia, fording, as he had often done, a swollen river on horseback, and the work on either side were roaring and crashing with the winds, while the red surging waves of the swiftly flowing current carried his horse to and fro, as it gallantly strove to reach the opposite bank.

His imagined danger grew so great, and the excitement consequent thereon increased to such a pitch, that he awoke. His first waking moments seemed to realize but more vividly the circumstances of his dream, for the roaring, rushing, sound continued, while harsher noises overhead, made by the tramping of feet and human voices, added to the confusion, and a violent heaving motion made the sensation still more alarming.

In a very few moments full consciousness returned to Bridgenorth, and with it the knowledge that the vessel was labouring in a violent storm. The increasing breeze which had carried them steadily forward all the previous day had evidently grown into a hurricane. The sea, too, seemed to have risen into something like angry madness, for the waves over which the ship was tossed were of a huge character, judging by the way which she rose and fell and pitched and reeled.

He sprang up, and in the faint morning light saw Helen sitting opposite with clasped hands and a pale but composed countenance, from which all great alarm had vanished.

"My child, are you awake?" was his first exclamation.
"I have been awake for the last half-hour," she replied; "and the tempest has been raging all the time. I have to cling to the seat to keep from falling."

"Why, this is fearful," said Bridgenorth, as they rose on a tremendous crest, and fell into the trough with a violence that made every fibre creak and shiver. "We had nothing like this on the long voyage from Australia. This little shell of a thing will never stand it, and they seem to have the same idea on deck, to judge from the noise they are making. Ha! I verily believe we are to go down."

With great difficulty he crossed the cabin and clasped her in his arms, only to be filled with wonder at her quiet composure.

"My darling," he murmured, "I am glad to see you so calm. This is a situation which appals most hearts."

"I am calm, father," she replied, "because I think it may be Heaven's method of working our deliverance."

"And bringing retribution on the authors of the outrage," he added. "It seems very like it. Can they not find a port into which they may run for shelter? If they do not, my darling, then I fear the worst must come."

"Oh no, father, not the worst," rejoined Helen. "The worst would have been to have lived and remain in the power of Dukeauque. I welcome death since it saves me from that. But you, father—I grieve that this fate should overtake you."

"Life without you," he rejoined, "would be to me a curse rather than a blessing. I would save you, my darling—oh, I would die to save you to love, and to Hermann; but if that may not be then let us die together."

"Poor Hermann," sighed Helen, her thoughts being sent by her father's words to her lover, left forlorn and desolate.

Then they relapsed into silence, waiting, as they thought, for the moment when the ship should go down, for the storm raged with unabated fierceness, and the vessel heaved and pitched with undiminished violence—the waves sometimes dashing over her in thunder and spray, or else lifting her on their crest to bury her next moment in their depths—every time she descended causing the fear that she would not again rise.

Taus, amid alternations of grey light and gloomy darkness, father and daughter sat holding by each other, and looking into each other's faces with love and tenderness, not knowing but every moment as it came might give them the last earthly glimpse, and find them struggling together in the cold and pitiless arms of death.

Leaving them thus, let us ascend to the

Too much cannot be said as to their superiority over the ordinary glasses worn—there is no glimmering, wavering of the sight, dizziness, or other unpleasant sensation, but on the contrary, from the peculiar construction of the Lenses, they are soothing and pleasant, causing a feeling of relief to the wearer and producing a clear and distinct vision as in the natural and healthy sight. They are the only spectacles that preserve as well as assist the sight, and are the cheapest because the best, always lasting many years without change being necessary.
