The Scrap Bag.

"As it fell upon a day In the merry month of May, Sitting in a pleasant shade,

Which a grove of myrtles made," It was my good fortune to witness an old-fashioned dance about the May pole. Not "once upon a time," nor in "days gone by"; not in far distant England, nor sunny France, but right here, day before yesterday, not so many miles from London. A little bird had whispered that a band of fairies inhabiting a charming spot on the north branch of the Thames would, if the sun shone fair upon their holiday, come trooping forth to choose a queen and deck a May pole.

Of course, we all wanted to be there, and when Saturday last dawned, pure and sunny, all that a May day should be, there were many of ho wended our way to the soft gree, sward of an eyry perched above the city, where the revels of the May were to be held. Now

I will be asked to describe what I saw, and that is just the trouble. I am not a describer of even the meanest ability. and Washington Irving, coming straight from England, would have found no unworthy task for his pen in making into a prose poem the pretty scene of Saturday. There was material enough for one that day, which was "a van-bird of summer," with a fresh breeze, on which was borne every now and then the fitful fragrance of the lilac and the hawthorn. "Blue sky spreading east and west, and a river humming a rugged tune." But when the doors of the eyry (which is in reality a dove-cote) opened, and all the young American eagles—I mean pretty doves — came fluttering across the grass in pale muslins and bright-hued ribbands, disporting themselves under the great branches of the beeches that cast long, slanting shadows on the grass before the Hellmuth College of a summer's afternoon, why, one longed for the resurrection of the author of "Old Christmas and Bracebridge Hall." And then came the crowning of the young Queen of May with May-blossoms, the dance about the May pole, and the stately minuet! It was pretty. The scene, the sky, that day, were so many yards of transparent green chiffon, silver galloon, and shim-mering satin, all the materials for an incroyable robe de bal, and no one to put them together. A poet was what with it. We will leave it to him, I It is a sad fate to be born a multimillionaire. No good times for the Hammersley baby boy, no fun for the heir of the Astors, nothing but care for the infant Gould, who already owns three railroads and plays with their tin pro-totypes in padded rooms watched by his fond mamma and a retinue of nurses. Alas, who envies such kids? Surely, not the free-born light infantry that trudges to kindergarten with a basket of sugar cookies for luncheon, or who about in the gutters unmindful of its clothes, and innocent of any need of protection save the kind given to the sparrow that falleth to the ground. The children of royalty are not as badly off as are these chicks born under the aegis of great American wealth, for traditions protect them, while the baby

A broad veranda, especially an hotel veranda, shaded by trailing vines and gaily colored awnings, is in especial favor with the young people these long summer evenings, when the soft twilight has brought out the young moon, like a clearly-cut crescent. There, the soft sound of the distant band on the beach can be heard, but so subdued as to seem like the singing of human voices; the splash, splash of the waves their note of accompaniment, and altogether the effect is most soothing and restful, even to these young folks, who are not expected to feel the ills of life as keenly as their elders.

The marked feature of all summer gowns for home, street, full dress occasions, seaside and mountain resorts, is still the sleeve. "Make me a handsome and stylish sleeve, and I don't care about the rest of the dress," said a fashionable woman in my hearing to a modiste the other day. This wo-man's remark voiced the feeling of many another. When intimate friends meet it is no longer "What a lovely gown you have on; who made it?" but 'My dear, how handsome your sleeves are—made all in one piece, too, with the very latest wrinkles. Mrs. K is the only modiste in town who can make such sleeves-how artistically she drapes," and then the two women discuss sleeves with as much ardor as Amelia B. Edwards ever used in talking about the marvelous treasures of the ancient cities of Egypt.
