A Transient Experience

And now it was evident that whatever wisdom had come out of the folly of climbing the Gray Man on a winter afternoon was incontestable. It was twilight already, and the early dusk came soft, slow, and certain. The moon had yet to rise, but though, fortunately, the night was in considerable danger. At any step among the loose pebbles and boulders he might break his leg or neck, and if he stayed where he was till dawn, without wraps or shelter, the cold would be intolerable. On the whole he preferred the risk of an accident to the certainty of rheumatic fever. "The Gray Man's going to have my bones," he thought, as he scrambled on, hoping to get over the worst of it before the light entirely died out. He was active and agile, and though he did not dare to go back down the face of the rocks, he managed to slide along them, knowing that he must at last get off them to the steep green descent which led down to the narrow pass between the two peaks. Then he could easily follow the path back to Moss Head, and so on to the inn.

His unwary foot started a loose stone, and he heard it bang and knock and grind its way down the side of the mountain; an inch more and he might have fallen with it. Every possible contingency pictured itself to his vivid imagination.

Suppose he met his death on the mountain side. It might be weeks, months, before any one knew it. He had never stated the object of his journey at Whitebury, nor of his walk at the Nag's Head, and it was off the track of shepherd or tourist. His friend would think he was lingering, then they would know he was "missing," would first blame him, and then, when he failed to appear, they would feel all the variations in his mother's fears for him. Such a death would be failure indeed.

These mental pictures did not distract him from the most careful feeling and picking his way. He had not quite the foot of a mountaineer, nor the instinct of one; but happily, a rising moon gave a little light, and at last he felt the turf under his feet, firm, short, and dry, and looking down and around him, saw a light below, a light that could only come from a cottage window.

George made for it as fast as he could, and presently found himself close to a little rough-cast stone roofed hut, of the same character as Moss Head itself, but much smaller and poorer, and he knocked at the door, the upper half of which was opened and with the red firelight behind him, there stood in it a tall old man.

"Can you give me ten minutes' rest, and a bit of bread and cheese, and send me the way back to Nag's Head in Wardale? I've lost my way in the dark on the Gray Man over there. It's rough walking," said his host. "Ye might say 'ha' lost your life, instead of your way."

"That's true, I believe," said George, coming in, and sitting down gladly on the wooden chair offered to him; for he began to know that he was very tired. There was a tall, young woman there with almost perfectly regular features, dark hair and eyes, and a calm, steady face, without a flutter or a smile on it.

"Is young Mr. Gladwyn?" she said. "Ye were at your old auntie's burying."

"Yes," said George, "so you see I came here again as soon as I could. I met you, didn't I, Mr. Wilson, on the hill, and asked you about the funeral. I was just in time for it."

"Ay, so it was," said old Wilson, while his granddaughter produced tea and a loaf of somewhat bitter bread, oat-cake and butter.

"Did you get as far as 't' Gray Man?" said Wilson. "Eh, 'tis a 't' Gray Man!" George described the practical part of his adventures.

"And this," said Wilson, "was the door that Daniel Gladwyn knocked at, when he came down from the mountain, and brought a blessing with him."

"How?" said George. "Tell me." Then the old shepherd in language difficult to reproduce, and not easy for George to follow, told him that when he was a young boy, the little head-stead belonged to his father, who like many in those lonely valleys, had taken to drink and had fallen into a deep melancholy, so that it was feared he might put an end to himself, as many another had done, when solitude and drink, and perhaps the influence of the wild and awful scenery oppressed their spirits beyond endurance, and then, after a night during which his wife had watched him closely, and the children had lain trembling in the bed, "Auld Dan" had appeared at the door, in the dawn of the morning, weary and worn after a night on the Gray Man, but with eyes that shone with joy, and how at once he had seen the trouble, and had so dealt and so prayed with the sufferer that the plague had passed away from him and he had gone whole and sane till he died. And "Auld Dan" Gladwyn did as much for many another. He met the Lord up on, and came down in the tower of his sight. So, sir, you're kindly welcome to bite and sup, for the sake of them ye come of."

And then, for it was still quite early in the evening, he asked to be set on his way back to Kirk Andrew, and the old man took up his stick and accompanied him as far as Moss Head. When George parted from his guide at the stile, and looked for the last time at the Gray Man, behold the green fells round him were black and dark, and beyond, the great mountain head shone like silver in the light of the risen moon, no longer an accuser, but an angel friend.

CHAPTER XVII.
George slept soundly after his supper at the Nag's Head, for he was tired out; so tired that in sleep the present slipped away from him and he found himself back in the past, and dreamed that he was sitting by the fire at Longhurst Vicarage, and Panny, with her brown hair falling over her shoulders as of old, was telling him that she had kept the cakes hot for his tea. He was up and away again with the first light of morning, retraced his long journey, and got back to Whitebury, not so late but that he could report himself at St. Peter's Vicarage, and find out if anything had happened since he went away.

When he came into the drawing-room, Panny was sitting there alone. He caught a glimpse of her, unoccupied, looking in the fire, got just an impression that her face was sad, before she sprang up and greeted him. "George! There you are! You said two days. I've got back. I've done what I had to do, and here I am. I want to talk to your father, and to know where Norman is. I've something to say to him."

"Yes," said Panny, "all sorts of things have happened. Gerard Norman settled, after they had all met yesterday morning—it was only yesterday, but it seems ages ago—that he must go to Atlanta himself to set matters right there. He said there was nothing else to be done, and he declared he could bring home proofs to satisfy everybody. But you don't know what was said."

"Yes, yes, I do. I had a letter from my brother Mark. And so he is going out there?"

"He came down this morning to see father, and had to leave with him a young man who had made a mistake. He should be no trouble about Helena's money if anything happened to him. Father walked back to the station, and as they went by Corners, the railway omnibus and Dr. T. and the dog cart were both coming along different ways, and Miss Wynne was crossing the road, and when she saw Gerard Norman, she clasped her hands and screamed, and whirled round to go back, never seeing what was coming, and Gerard darted out and whisked her out of the way of the omnibus, but somehow he got knocked down himself, and hurt. Dr. T. was there, and your mother came out, and she made them take him into Corners, and he's got a blow on the head, and broken three ribs, and there's no chance of his going to Canada at present."

"Yes, Mrs. Gladwyn when she heard that he'd no near belongings, said that she couldn't turn him out. Suppose it had been you?"

"Dear old mother! But—is he going to die?"

"I hope not, but he's rather bad," said Panny. "Father and mother have gone up to see him, and to make arrangements."

"He saved Miss Wynne's life?"

"Yes, she went into hysterics in the road, and the omnibus took her home." George laughed in an odd, fierce fashion. Then he said in quite another tone: "And Fanny, your queen?"

"Oh, George, it's all most strange, and unreliable. She does not say anything but she wants him to get well and to turn out good, George," said George gravely, "and I believe he will."

"You don't think your brother's right about him, then?"

"STOP THIEF!" It is an old trick among the light-fingered fraternity to start the cry of "stop thief" and so putting the public on a false scent.

There is a certain kind of advertiser who is expert in similar methods. One of his tricks is to tell women that it is "revolting" to write to a man in consultation about disease. "Women should write to a woman." The remainder of the advertisement invites women to write for advice, and is carefully worded to convey the idea that the advice offered is that of a physician. But a close examination shows that there is no physician's advice offered and the whole clamor of "write to a woman" is raised to divert attention from the fact that the woman offering advice is not a doctor, and therefore not competent to give medical advice.

For the advice of an unqualified woman is just as dangerous as the advice of an unqualified man.

Women who are sick can obtain medical advice free by letter, by consulting Dr. R. Pierce, chief consulting physician of the Invalids' Hotel and Sanatorium, Buffalo, N. Y. As an expert in the treatment and cure of female diseases Dr. Pierce takes the highest rank. In over thirty years' experience he has treated half-a-million women and of that great number ninety-eight per cent. have been perfectly and permanently cured. Each letter is held as private and its contents guarded as a sacred confidence.

Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription makes Weak Women Strong and Sick Women Well.
