Mutinous Aegro Waterman Throws

a Captain Overboard and Then Drowns Himself. PORTSMOUTH, April 11. On Thursday night the freight barge Neuse, loaded with fish and shingles, under the command of Capt. David Crocker, narle Sound was slow and difficult. Premarle Sound was slow and difficult. Previous to sailing Captain Crocker had had some difficulty with one of his negro hands, named Andrew Whitehurst, and the negro at once began to nurse such a dreadful animosity towards the Captain that he went to Mrs. Crocker, who sailed with her husband and was on deck at the time, while the Captain was below, and, accosting her angrily, remarked:

"Madame, your husband shoved his first under my nose."

Mrs. Crocker replied, "Well, Andrew, you shouldn't mind him. You know how high tempered and passionate he is at times," and began to entreat him to cherish no ill-feeling in the mit er

The negro was not disposed to a recoulding the success of the times, and began to entreat him to cherish no ill-feeling in the mit er cherish no ill-feeling in the mit er

The negro was not disposed to a reconciliation, however, and he ended the conversation with the sullen threat, "Well, never mind, what's between us will be made all right in a day or two."

During the dist watch Whitehurst was called upon by Captain Crocker to take his place at the wheel. He refused to do so, and when the 'second watch came round he also refused to obey the Captain and go to the wheel. At the third watch, which was between three and four o'clock he obeyed the Captain, and took his station steering the barge. The wind was blowing a gale at the time, and a portion of the decklosd of the barge was swept overboard. Captain Crocker could not sleep, and merely reclined in his berth. Perceiving that the barge steered badly, he went on deck to see what was the matter.

he went on deck to see what was the matter.

Shortly afterwards Mrs. Crocker heard her husband at words with Whitehurst and heard his voice singing out very loud, several times, as she thought to those on board the tug Ludlow. A short time after this, while Mrs. Crocker was listening and patiently waiting the return of her husband, she heard Whitehurst tel one of the negro crew, who came at, that the captain had just fallen overboard. She immediately flew up the cabin ladder and on deck and charged Witehurst with having thrown Captain Crocker overboard. Whitehurst stoutly dealed having committed the murder, and deny the act that overwhelmed him.

The whole transaction happened off the mouth of Perquimon's River, where the Sound is eight or nine miles wide.
