Stephen Phillips, precentor of Peterborough Cathedral. He was educated at Stratford and Peterborough grammar schools, studied for the civil service, tried his hand at acting, then became an army tutor, and finally turned to literature. It was during his first year at Queen's College, Cambridge, that F. R. Benson's Dramatic Company visited the town. Phillips left college, joined the company, and for six years played several minor parts.

The first of his works to arrest attention was a collection of poems, "Christ in Hades," which appeared in 1896. Previous to this a slender volume of verses containing a number of his contributions had appeared in Oxford, under the title "Primavera," and a long philosophical Recently a Whitman admirer came from Chicago to Camden simply to see the house where the poet lived. He was directed to Mickel Street, but being unable to identify the house he stepped into an oyster dive on Mickel Street, between Fourth and Fifth Streets. He asked the proprietor, an elderly man, to point out the Whitman house.

Income derived from his plays and verses was considerable, Phillips always displayed an ignorance of the value of money, and an utter carelessness in spending it. He was constantly borrowing from friends and money lenders, and his affairs got in osuch a state in 1909 that he was driven into bankruptcy. He at one time lived in the same neighbourhood with Rudyard Kinling who, for a long period. Assisted Kinling who, for a long period.

Concerning the European war, Phillips had less to say than most English writers. In a recent letter to the London Daily Mail, however, he referred to it as "a mighty lockjaw of mediocrities," and bewailed the fact that, vast as the struggle was, it had failed to develop a single genius—Evening Post, New York.

The fish caught by this promiscuous method are, however, apt to be damaged, owing to the rough handling. The otter trawl scoops up everything from the bottom of the sea and the whole mass is dumped unceremonlously on the deck. Consequently the fish often arrive in the market with scarcely any scales on and with the flesh bruised and thus deteriorated. Moreover, the steam trawlers often remain a considerable time at sea before delivering their catch on shore. The best fish are certainly those taken inshore on the hook and line, carefully handled and quiskly landed and sold.
