A good story is told at the expense of a well known townsman and curling rink attendant. He is a hunter of some note, but his forte is not large game. Recently he was driving out some distance in the country and took his gun, on the lookout for quarry. While returning he bagged a partridge and was about to start off again, when he saw the name of the game on a large bull moose eyeing him intently. The hunter was in his team, and had his gun—in fact, two guns with him, but when he saw the big monarch of the forest all his thirst for game was always. He stared at the brute a d edged away in his seat. The moose still stared, and getting desperate, Mr. Nimrod took his gun and fired both barrels—in the air. This had the desired effect and the moose took to his heels.
