A Tale of the Time of Henry VIII.

'I have marked him,' said the master, 'and have marvelled what slied the lad. His merry temper hath left him. I never hear him singing to keep time with his hammer, nor keeping the court in a roar with his gibes. I trust he is not running after the new doctring of the hawkers and peddiars. His troubler was inclined that way.'

'It may be he misseth his brother. The boys will care for this rarce-show more than thon or I, Tib! We've seen enough of them in our day, though werily they say this is to surpass all that ever were beheld.

The question of who was to go had not been hitherts decided, and Giles and Stophen were both so excited at being chosen that all low spirits and moodiness were dispelled, and the work which went on almost all night was merrify got through. The Dragon court was in a perpetual commotion with knights, squires, and grooms, coming in with orders for use armor, or for old to be furbished, and the tentmakers, lorimers, mercers, and tailors had their hands equally full. These fengthening mornings beard the hamser ringing at sunrise, and in the final rush, Smallbones never went to bed at all. He mid he aboute make it up in the wagon on the way to Dover.
