

Treat Every Child's Cold Externally Rub on "Nerviline"—A Safe Cure.

A Miracle of Healing Power in Every Bottle.

Little children can't be expected to romp, day in and day out, without sometime coming to grief. Some of their games and rough and tumble, cause undue fatigue, and not infrequently the kidneys are bruised, have strains, swellings and aches just like their elders.

When children come in tired and sore see they are well rubbed with Nerviline. It does wonders in breaking up a cold—has an amazing effect on any sort of muscular pain.

The wise mother always keeps trusty old Nerviline on hand. It has a wonderful list of uses, and a bottle handy on the bedroom shelf often saves calling in the doctor.

Young and old alike can safely use Nerviline—there's no harm in it—just a heap of curative power when you rub it on.

When ever there is a pain or sickness, Nerviline should be close by. It is a true specific for rheumatism, lumbago, sciatica or neuralgia.

As for earache, toothache, sore, back sprains or strains, nothing else will cure so fast as good old Nerviline. In use about fifty years—sold by dealers everywhere. The large 50c. family size bottle is the most economical; trial size 25c.

Phyllis Dearborn

OR, THE
Countess of Basingwell

CHAPTER XXXII.

Lionel had not seen his wife leave him in the way she did and after the words she had spoken, without experiencing a pang of doubt and trouble; but she had so imbued him with a sense of her utter unworthiness and deceitfulness that it was impossible for him to credit her with any other than a bad motive.

Still he could not reconcile her conduct with any reasonable theory. His first thought had been that she had come merely in a spirit of fendiash mockery, trying to urge him into an exhibition of the fury that had recently more than once nearly mastered him.

He dropped into his chair as the door closed behind her, and sat there listening until he could no longer hear the noise of her footfall in the hall.

"She said we begin a new life from to-day," he muttered. "Yes, we do." He leaned his elbow on the desk and rested his chin in the palm of his hand. "A new life; but what will it be? The only happiness it can contain for me will be separation from her. How could she have done it? It seems hardly human to have been so base, so utterly faithless to the traditions of her sex and kind."

He rose and walked the floor—not hurriedly, as one in a stress of passion, but slowly and deliberately, as one who has tasted from the cup of despair and grown numb, but not resigned.

"He said her name was Phyllis," he murmured, reverting to the interview with the lawyer and his client. "Phyllis Dearborn. I wonder what her surname is! But it does not matter—if I know no other name she will be plain Phyllis to me. And dear little Carrie! I wonder where they are? I am poor now, and if I knew I might go to them and live their life, and we could be brother and sisters. Strange what a hold these two simple children—they were scarcely more—have on my life! I have had them constantly in my thoughts while I believed myself happy and prosperous; and now, in the midst of my shattered faith in woman they stand out clear and shining. I would give all I possess, though that would be little now, for the strengthening glance of those honest, true brown eyes."

It was not, indeed, the first time he had thought of his two little friends, who had come into and gone out of his life so suddenly. He had thought of them so much that they had become like old friends; and often when he was by the side of the woman whom he loved because he believed she loved him, with a pure and noble affection, she had been on the point of telling her of them. But there had always been something to restrain him. And now he was glad that that episode of his life was all his own. The sweetness and purity of that association was not marred by the thought that she was making a scoff of it.

He turned to his writing and resolutely took up his pen. The work had to do with the estate, and he was determined to present everything in proper order on the morrow, for his lawyers to act upon without further reference to him. This done, there would only remain the Warne estates which could be recovered from his wife by process of law if she refused to yield them willingly. They had been redeemed with Basingwell money, and they must be given up.

He wondered that she had made no reference to the estates. She must have known that it would be difficult to obtain them from her, and yet she had said nothing about them—whether she would try to retain them or not. She unquestionably had acquiesced in his statement that they were penniless. Perhaps, he thought grimly, she did not know that she could make a stout fight for the property, and would yield it up in her ignorance. It did not occur to him as possible that she would give the property up except through ignorance or force.

He had always, even in his spendthrift days, been careful of business matters. He had made up his mind from the first that he would never go in debt for more than he could pay for; and the old habit had come with him into the new life. He had kept his affairs in good order, and it only remained for him to make an inventory as to his assets, as a basis of settlement with the new heir. The money that had been spent he would also put down, and if the time ever came that he could he would repay it. But it was unlikely that the time would come, and so he shrugged his shoulders, and thought he would not have grudged it if it had been his case.

All that night he wrote. Sometimes his thoughts would overmaster him, and he would get up and pace the floor; but for the most of the long night he sat at his desk, with papers piled around him, working hard to make an end of his holding of the estate and title. Both had become unpleasant to him.

By dawn his task was finished, and he went through the silent dwelling to his apartments. There Harrison sat waiting for him, as he had sat through the whole night. He had slept, as he had learned to do, sitting; but he had known that something was troubling his master, and he would have waited a week for him rather than risk not being ready when he was wanted.

Lionel had never thought of his valet, and he started to see him standing respectfully before him when he entered the room, for Harrison was awake and alert in a moment, and was standing almost before Lionel had seen that he had been sitting.

"Why did you wait, Harrison? It is morning."

"I thought you might need me, your lordship, after being up so long."

"I have been writing, Harrison. I will lie down for a little while. You are a faithful fellow, Harrison. I wonder at you."

"It is easy to be faithful to you, your lordship," answered Harrison.

"Is it?" said Lionel. "Oh, you mean easy for you."

Harrison did not make any reply, but helped to disrobe his master in silence. When that was done, he asked:

"Any orders, your lordship?"

"No—yes. Go to bed and get some rest. And, Harrison, never be so foolish again as to be faithful to anybody."

Harrison only looked troubled at this, and did not say anything. Lionel glanced at him.

"Do you remember that I told you once that we must part, Harrison?" he said.

"Yes, your lordship."

"I have to tell you so again, Harrison."

"May I ask the reason, your lordship?" asked Harrison, looking more than ever troubled.

"Yes; it is because I am no longer the Earl of Basingwell. A new heir has turned up, and I am as poor as I was when I had made an end of the Warne property. Poorer, in fact, for now I am in debt, and then I was not; now I have a wife, and then I had no one. Don't look so grieved, Harrison. I am glad of it—heartyly glad of it."

Harrison started to speak. Lionel stopped him with a smile.

"No, Harrison; don't say it. I am just as much obliged as I was before. But you must see that it would never do for me to take any man's money. There's one thing, though, Harrison—I am sure you would be happy if you knew how much I honored and respected you. Don't say anything. I tell you this now because I shall not care to talk when I awake, and somebody ought to be able to tell the servants when I am gone away. I shall go away to-morrow, and shall not return. I don't know my wife's plans yet."

Harrison wondered at the meaning of that, but of course made no comment on it. He had not failed to see that his master and mistress were not on terms of affection with each other; but had not suspected that the breach could be as wide as these words denoted. He left his master and went to his own room, but more to wait for the rising of the household than to sleep, for he had had all the sleep he would need, and his faithful nature was greatly distressed by the revelation made to him by Lionel.

It was eight o'clock in the morning, perhaps, and he was still thinking it over, when he was startled by a loud cry from some one in the corridor, and he went hastily out saw Marta. She was shaking her hands and looking distraught, and might have cried out again, if he had not stopped her with a sharp inquiry of the meaning of her emotion.

"Oh, Mr. Harrison," she said, earnestly, "there's trouble here, there's trouble here!"

"Well, don't take the castle into your confidence. What is the matter?"

"Her ladyship is gone! I'm sure she's gone!"

"Be sensible, Marta," he said, sharply. "Why do you think such a thing as that?"

"Her bed hasn't been slept on, her things have been tossed about, her travelling hat and cloak are gone, and here's a letter for his lordship."

"Well, give me the letter, Marta, and don't on any account say anything about it to the servants."

"Maybe she done away with herself, Mr. Harrison," suggested Marta.

"It isn't likely. Now if you will keep quiet, and remain in your mistress's apartments, so that none of the servants can suspect, I will promise to come to you the very first one, and tell you all his lordship is willing you should know—if there should be anything to know."

Marta would have done more than that at the request of Harrison, for it was very well known that he was a man of wealth, and the maid would not have been unwilling to please him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Lionel had not seen his wife leave him in the way she did and after the words she had spoken, without experiencing a pang of doubt and trouble; but she had so imbued him with a sense of her utter unworthiness and deceitfulness that it was impossible for him to credit her with any other than a bad motive.

Still he could not reconcile her conduct with any reasonable theory. His first thought had been that she had come merely in a spirit of fendiash mockery, trying to urge him into an exhibition of the fury that had recently more than once nearly mastered him.

He dropped into his chair as the door closed behind her, and sat there listening until he could no longer hear the noise of her footfall in the hall.

"She said we begin a new life from to-day," he muttered. "Yes, we do." He leaned his elbow on the desk and rested his chin in the palm of his hand. "A new life; but what will it be? The only happiness it can contain for me will be separation from her. How could she have done it? It seems hardly human to have been so base, so utterly faithless to the traditions of her sex and kind."

He rose and walked the floor—not hurriedly, as one in a stress of passion, but slowly and deliberately, as one who has tasted from the cup of despair and grown numb, but not resigned.

"He said her name was Phyllis," he murmured, reverting to the interview with the lawyer and his client. "Phyllis Dearborn. I wonder what her surname is! But it does not matter—if I know no other name she will be plain Phyllis to me. And dear little Carrie! I wonder where they are? I am poor now, and if I knew I might go to them and live their life, and we could be brother and sisters. Strange what a hold these two simple children—they were scarcely more—have on my life! I have had them constantly in my thoughts while I believed myself happy and prosperous; and now, in the midst of my shattered faith in woman they stand out clear and shining. I would give all I possess, though that would be little now, for the strengthening glance of those honest, true brown eyes."

It was not, indeed, the first time he had thought of his two little friends, who had come into and gone out of his life so suddenly. He had thought of them so much that they had become like old friends; and often when he was by the side of the woman whom he loved because he believed she loved him, with a pure and noble affection,

she had been on the point of telling her of them. But there had always been something to restrain him. And now he was glad that that episode of his life was all his own. The sweetness and purity of that association was not marred by the thought that she was making a scoff of it.

He turned to his writing and resolutely took up his pen. The work had to do with the estate, and he was determined to present everything in proper order on the morrow, for his lawyers to act upon without further reference to him. This done, there would only remain the Warne estates which could be recovered from his wife by process of law if she refused to yield them willingly. They had been redeemed with Basingwell money, and they must be given up.

He wondered that she had made no reference to the estates. She must have known that it would be difficult to obtain them from her, and yet she had said nothing about them—whether she would try to retain them or not. She unquestionably had acquiesced in his statement that they were penniless. Perhaps, he thought grimly, she did not know that she could make a stout fight for the property, and would yield it up in her ignorance. It did not occur to him as possible that she would give the property up except through ignorance or force.

He had always, even in his spendthrift days, been careful of business matters. He had made up his mind from the first that he would never go in debt for more than he could pay for; and the old habit had come with him into the new life. He had kept his affairs in good order, and it only remained for him to make an inventory as to his assets, as a basis of settlement with the new heir. The money that had been spent he would also put down, and if the time ever came that he could he would repay it. But it was unlikely that the time would come, and so he shrugged his shoulders, and thought he would not have grudged it if it had been his case.

All that night he wrote. Sometimes his thoughts would overmaster him, and he would get up and pace the floor; but for the most of the long night he sat at his desk, with papers piled around him, working hard to make an end of his holding of the estate and title. Both had become unpleasant to him.

By dawn his task was finished, and he went through the silent dwelling to his apartments. There Harrison sat waiting for him, as he had sat through the whole night. He had slept, as he had learned to do, sitting; but he had known that something was troubling his master, and he would have waited a week for him rather than risk not being ready when he was wanted.

Lionel had never thought of his valet, and he started to see him standing respectfully before him when he entered the room, for Harrison was awake and alert in a moment, and was standing almost before Lionel had seen that he had been sitting.

"Why did you wait, Harrison? It is morning."

"I thought you might need me, your lordship, after being up so long."

"I have been writing, Harrison. I will lie down for a little while. You are a faithful fellow, Harrison. I wonder at you."

"It is easy to be faithful to you, your lordship," answered Harrison.

"Is it?" said Lionel. "Oh, you mean easy for you."

Harrison did not make any reply, but helped to disrobe his master in silence. When that was done, he asked:

"Any orders, your lordship?"

"No—yes. Go to bed and get some rest. And, Harrison, never be so foolish again as to be faithful to anybody."

Harrison only looked troubled at this, and did not say anything. Lionel glanced at him.

"Do you remember that I told you once that we must part, Harrison?" he said.

"Yes, your lordship."

"I have to tell you so again, Harrison."

"May I ask the reason, your lordship?" asked Harrison, looking more than ever troubled.

"Yes; it is because I am no longer the Earl of Basingwell. A new heir

has turned up, and I am as poor as I was when I had made an end of the Warne property. Poorer, in fact, for now I am in debt, and then I was not; now I have a wife, and then I had no one. Don't look so grieved, Harrison. I am glad of it—heartyly glad of it."

Harrison started to speak. Lionel stopped him with a smile.

"No, Harrison; don't say it. I am just as much obliged as I was before. But you must see that it would never do for me to take any man's money. There's one thing, though, Harrison—I am sure you would be happy if you knew how much I honored and respected you. Don't say anything. I tell you this now because I shall not care to talk when I awake, and somebody ought to be able to tell the servants when I am gone away. I shall go away to-morrow, and shall not return. I don't know my wife's plans yet."

Harrison wondered at the meaning of that, but of course made no comment on it. He had not failed to see that his master and mistress were not on terms of affection with each other; but had not suspected that the breach could be as wide as these words denoted. He left his master and went to his own room, but more to wait for the rising of the household than to sleep, for he had had all the sleep he would need, and his faithful nature was greatly distressed by the revelation made to him by Lionel.

It was eight o'clock in the morning, perhaps, and he was still thinking it over, when he was startled by a loud cry from some one in the corridor, and he went hastily out saw Marta. She was shaking her hands and looking distraught, and might have cried out again, if he had not stopped her with a sharp inquiry of the meaning of her emotion.

"Oh, Mr. Harrison," she said, earnestly, "there's trouble here, there's trouble here!"

"Well, don't take the castle into your confidence. What is the matter?"

"Her ladyship is gone! I'm sure she's gone!"

"Be sensible, Marta," he said, sharply. "Why do you think such a thing as that?"

"Her bed hasn't been slept on, her things have been tossed about, her travelling hat and cloak are gone, and here's a letter for his lordship."

"Well, give me the letter, Marta, and don't on any account say anything about it to the servants."

"Maybe she done away with herself, Mr. Harrison," suggested Marta.

"It isn't likely. Now if you will keep quiet, and remain in your mistress's apartments, so that none of the servants can suspect, I will promise to come to you the very first one, and tell you all his lordship is willing you should know—if there should be anything to know."

Marta would have done more than that at the request of Harrison, for it was very well known that he was a man of wealth, and the maid would not have been unwilling to please him.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Lionel had not seen his wife leave him in the way she did and after the words she had spoken, without experiencing a pang of doubt and trouble; but she had so imbued him with a sense of her utter unworthiness and deceitfulness that it was impossible for him to credit her with any other than a bad motive.

Still he could not reconcile her conduct with any reasonable theory. His first thought had been that she had come merely in a spirit of fendiash mockery, trying to urge him into an exhibition of the fury that had recently more than once nearly mastered him.

He dropped into his chair as the door closed behind her, and sat there listening until he could no longer hear the noise of her footfall in the hall.

"She said we begin a new life from to-day," he muttered. "Yes, we do." He leaned his elbow on the desk and rested his chin in the palm of his hand. "A new life; but what will it be? The only happiness it can contain for me will be separation from her. How could she have done it? It seems hardly human to have been so base, so utterly faithless to the traditions of her sex and kind."

He rose and walked the floor—not hurriedly, as one in a stress of passion, but slowly and deliberately, as one who has tasted from the cup of despair and grown numb, but not resigned.

"He said her name was Phyllis," he murmured, reverting to the interview with the lawyer and his client. "Phyllis Dearborn. I wonder what her surname is! But it does not matter—if I know no other name she will be plain Phyllis to me. And dear little Carrie! I wonder where they are? I am poor now, and if I knew I might go to them and live their life, and we could be brother and sisters. Strange what a hold these two simple children—they were scarcely more—have on my life! I have had them constantly in my thoughts while I believed myself happy and prosperous; and now, in the midst of my shattered faith in woman they stand out clear and shining. I would give all I possess, though that would be little now, for the strengthening glance of those honest, true brown eyes."

It was not, indeed, the first time he had thought of his two little friends, who had come into and gone out of his life so suddenly. He had thought of them so much that they had become like old friends; and often when he was by the side of the woman whom he loved because he believed she loved him, with a pure and noble affection,

she had been on the point of telling her of them. But there had always been something to restrain him. And now he was glad that that episode of his life was all his own. The sweetness and purity of that association was not marred by the thought that she was making a scoff of it.

He turned to his writing and resolutely took up his pen. The work had to do with the estate, and he was determined to present everything in proper order on the morrow, for his lawyers to act upon without further reference to him. This done, there would only remain the Warne estates which could be recovered from his wife by process of law if she refused to yield them willingly. They had been redeemed with Basingwell money, and they must be given up.

He wondered that she had made no reference to the estates. She must have known that it would be difficult to obtain them from her, and yet she had said nothing about them—whether she would try to retain them or not. She unquestionably had acquiesced in his statement that they were penniless. Perhaps, he thought grimly, she did not know that she could make a stout fight for the property, and would yield it up in her ignorance. It did not occur to him as possible that she would give the property up except through ignorance or force.

He had always, even in his spendthrift days, been careful of business matters. He had made up his mind from the first that he would never go in debt for more than he could pay for; and the old habit had come with him into the new life. He had kept his affairs in good order, and it only remained for him to make an inventory as to his assets, as a basis of settlement with the new heir. The money that had been spent he would also put down, and if the time ever came that he could he would repay it. But it was unlikely that the time would come, and so he shrugged his shoulders, and thought he would not have grudged it if it had been his case.

All that night he wrote. Sometimes his thoughts would overmaster him, and he would get up and pace the floor; but for the most of the long night he sat at his desk, with papers piled around him, working hard to make an end of his holding of the estate and title. Both had become unpleasant to him.

By dawn his task was finished, and he went through the silent dwelling to his apartments. There Harrison sat waiting for him, as he had sat through the whole night. He had slept, as he had learned to do, sitting; but he had known that something was troubling his master, and he would have waited a week for him rather than risk not being ready when he was wanted.

Lionel had never thought of his valet, and he started to see him standing respectfully before him when he entered the room, for Harrison was awake and alert in a moment, and was standing almost before Lionel had seen that he had been sitting.

"Why did you wait, Harrison? It is morning."

"I thought you might need me, your lordship, after being up so long."

"I have been writing, Harrison. I will lie down for a little while. You are a faithful fellow, Harrison. I wonder at you."

"It is easy to be faithful to you, your lordship," answered Harrison.

"Is it?" said Lionel. "Oh, you mean easy for you."

Harrison did not make any reply, but helped to disrobe his master in silence. When that was done, he asked:

"Any orders, your lordship?"

"No—yes. Go to bed and get some rest. And, Harrison, never be so foolish again as to be faithful to anybody."

Harrison only looked troubled at this, and did not say anything. Lionel glanced at him.

"Do you remember that I told you once that we must part, Harrison?" he said.

"Yes, your lordship."

"I have to tell you so again, Harrison."

"May I ask the reason, your lordship?" asked Harrison, looking more than ever troubled.

"Yes; it is because I am no longer the Earl of Basingwell. A new heir

has turned up, and I am as poor as I was when I had made an end of the Warne property. Poorer, in fact, for now I am in debt, and then I was not; now I have a wife, and then I had no one. Don't look so grieved, Harrison. I am glad of it—heartyly glad of it."

Harrison started to speak. Lionel stopped him with a smile.

"No, Harrison; don't say it. I am just as much obliged as I was before. But you must see that it would never do for me to take any man's money. There's one thing, though, Harrison—I am sure you would be happy if you knew how much I honored and respected you. Don't say anything. I tell you this now because I shall not care to talk when I awake, and somebody ought to be able to tell the servants when I am gone away. I shall go away to-morrow, and shall not return. I don't know my wife's plans yet."

Harrison wondered at the meaning of that, but of course made no comment on it. He had not failed to see that his master and mistress were not on terms of affection with each other; but had not suspected that the breach could be as wide as these words denoted. He left his master and went to his own room, but more to wait for the rising of the household than to sleep, for he had had all the sleep he would need, and his faithful nature was greatly distressed by the revelation made to him by Lionel.

It was eight o'clock in the morning, perhaps, and he was still thinking it over, when he was startled by a loud cry from some one in the corridor, and he went hastily out saw Marta. She was shaking her hands and looking distraught, and might have cried out again, if he had not stopped her with a sharp inquiry of the meaning of her emotion.

"Oh, Mr. Harrison," she said, earnestly, "there's trouble here, there's trouble here!"

"Well, don't take the castle into your confidence. What is the matter?"

"Her ladyship is gone! I'm sure she's gone!"

"Be sensible, Marta," he said, sharply. "Why do you think such a thing as that?"

"Her bed hasn't been slept on, her things have been tossed about, her travelling hat and cloak are gone, and here's a letter for his lordship."

"Well, give me the letter, Marta, and don't on any account say anything about it to the servants."

"Maybe she done away with herself, Mr. Harrison," suggested Marta.

"It isn't likely. Now if you will keep quiet, and remain in your mistress's apartments, so that none of the servants can suspect, I will promise to come to you the very first one, and tell you all his lordship is willing you should know—if there should be anything to know."

Marta would have done more than that at the request of Harrison, for it was very well known that he was a man of wealth, and the maid would not have been unwilling to please him.

Learned from a Sample Nineteen Years Ago

That He Could Depend on Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills to Cure Many of the Common Ills of Life.

Living eighteen miles from a drug store Mr. Carr found it necessary to keep in the lodge some treatment to regulate the action of liver, kidneys and bowels.

To the habit of keeping these important organs active by the use of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills, when required, he attributes the good health of his large family.

Here, surely, is evidence of the value of these pills as a family medicine to protect the members of the family who use it from the common ill so many of which arises from constipation of the bowels and torpid condition of the liver and kidneys.

Mr. James Carr, Maynooth, Ont., writes: "About 19 years ago I received an envelope containing two boxes of Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills. I was doctoring at the time with two doctors, and as they did me no good I used the Pills, and by the time I

Big Proceeds for W. P. A. Funds.

The gross proceeds of the Grand Carnival, etc., held at the Prince's Hotel, Thursday night, amounting to $450. The entrance fees realized $360 and the ladies who served teas, $90. The expenses amounted to not more than $100 so that the net proceeds, $350, will be devoted to the Red Cross Division of the W. P. A. for which the event was promoted. All who were interested in this patriotic movement deserve congratulation on the success that attended their efforts.

had finished one box I was cured of the pain in the back and shoulders. "We have great confidence in Dr. Chase's Medicines. I have a family of ten children and have never had a doctor in the house for any of them. We live eighteen miles from a drug store and find that these Pills cure nearly all the ordinary ill by regulating the liver, kidneys and bowels. That we are all well and sound I attribute to their use and I have recommended them to hundreds and given away many a box because I believe there is no medicine so good."

By awakening the action of liver, kidneys and bowels Dr. Chase's Kidney-Liver Pills cleanse the system of poisons and remove the cause of biliousness, headaches, backache, lumbago, kidney disease and rheumatism. One pill a dose, 25 cents a box, all dealers, or Edmondson, Hates & Co., Ltd., Toronto.

Without Pure Blood Health is Impossible.

Owing to faulty action of the kidneys and liver, the blood becomes filled with disease germs that imperil health.

The first warnings are back-ache, dizziness, headache and lack of energy. Act quickly if you would avoid the terrible ravages of chronic kidney complaint. Get Dr. Hamilton's Pills to-day; they cure kidney and liver troubles for all time to come. No medicine relieves so promptly, cures so thoroughly. For good blood, clear complexion, healthy appetite, use that grand health-bringing medicine Dr. Hamilton's Pills. Get a 25c. box to-day.

Amusements.

GREAT MELO-DRAMA AT THE NICKEL.

The delightful programme at the Nickel Theatre yesterday was well attended, both at the afternoon and evening performances. The "Who Pays?" episode, entitled "For the Comedy," was most impressive. Ruth Roland and Henry King were the principal characters in this brilliant subject, excelled themselves. Another striking picture is the powerful two-part melo-drama "When the Tide Came In," by Thomas G. Chatterton and an all star cast. This picture is true to life and all should see it. The comedy is one of the funniest ever seen at the Nickel and it kept all in roars of laughter. It will be repeated this evening and we feel certain will draw the usual large Saturday night audiences. Monday there will be another elaborate programme.

BRITISH THEATRE.

The leading photo-play at the British last night was "The Blood of His Brother." It was a good lively drama and was thoroughly enjoyed by all present. The balance of the show was also good. The matinee this afternoon will be a special one, consisting of eleven reels, and ought to prove a big attraction for the children. "The Black Box" and the great 4-reel drama "Court Martial" will be included for the benefit of those who were unable to see this picture before. The show will be continuous and patrons should go early. The two big features will be shown after the intermission.

AT THE CRESCENT.

Five feature pictures constitute the big programme the Crescent Picture Palace is showing to-day, the productions of the best people in the business. "To the Death" is a Vitagraph feature the story of a Virginia feud, a dramatic and impressive lesson that we should be slow to anger, to live and let live. Pat O'Malley features in McQuade of the Traffic Squad, an Edison story of city life. "The Strength of Samson" is a Selig spectacular drama. "Her Convert" is a strong Biograph drama, and "The Bachelor's Burglar" is an Essanay comedy. Mr. Dave Parks sings a patriotic ballad, "My Red Rose Girl Farewell." Don't miss seeing this big week end show.

AT THE CITY HALL.

The weekly session of the Municipal Board was held last night. Chairman Gosling and Messrs. Ayr, Morris, Anderson, McNamara, Mullaly, McGrath, Withers and Jackman.

A cheque for $80, sent by His Excellency the Governor for improvements to Banerman Park was acknowledged with thanks. A new fountain will be erected in the Park out of the amount.

A communication was received from Mr. F. Blackall re shortage of water and the rights of a taxpayer. The matter was referred to the Engineer.

Two members of the sanitary staff, Stevenson and Sullivan, were reported to be unable to work through accidents. The Insurance Company will be advised to pay the weekly amount guaranteed.

The Martin Hardware Company asked if the Board intended to purchase a new steam roller. Referred to Engineer.

A. H. Caldwell asked for the position of City Impounder. His application was filed.

An anonymous letter asking for a light at the corner of William Street and Hayward Avenue was relegated to the waste paper basket.

The reports of the Engineer, Sanitary Supervisor, Health Officer, and Road Inspectors were read and adopted.

The meeting then closed.

Opening of Catalina Branch of O.S. Club.

Editor Evening Telegram.

Dear Sir—A meeting of the London members and friends of Overseas Club was held in the Methodist School Hall on Thursday, the 17th inst., for the purpose of forming a branch of the association in this town.

Mr. Robt. J. Randell was asked to take the Chair and Mr. Frank Hogan to act as Secretary. The Chairman then asked the Convenor, Mr. W. N. Snelgrove, to explain the object of the meeting, after which it was moved, seconded and carried that we form a branch to be known as the Catalina Branch of Overseas Club.

The following officers, etc., were unanimously elected:—

President—John G. Stone, Esq., M. H. A.

Vice-Presidents—Hon. Philip Templeman, M. L. C.; John P. Murphy, Esq., Fred. C. Snelgrove, Esq., Hon. Secretary—W. N. Snelgrove, Esq., J. P.

Hon. Treasurer—John J. White, Esq., J. P.

Auditors—Samuel W. Moffin, Esq., John T. Walsh, Esq., J. P.

Executive Committee—R. Albert Colledge, Esq., Dugald White, Esq., Peter Colledge, Esq., Fredk. Hartley, Esq., Joseph Joy, Esq., Charles F. Snelgrove, Esq.

The Club was then declared open by the Chairman who called on the officers present to take their places.

The President-elect being absent the Hon. P. Templeman presided, and the business proceeded in regular form.

A goodly number was present and 46 persons enrolled as members. We had some visitors from nearby towns viz. St. Margarets, Somerset, and Captain George Barbour from Trinity and St. Magistrate Roper, Rev. Fr. Dwyer, Hon. P. Templeman from Bonavista, all London members, and Dr. C. A. Forbes from Bonavista, all visiting the town especially for the occasion, and all joined the new branch. Nineteen others have enrolled since, making the total membership 65.

It may be of some interest to your readers to know something concerning the great movement known as the Overseas Club, founded by the great success of the German Navy League it was felt by some of the great statesmen of England that some such association should be started as a set-off on August 27th, 1910, the Overseas Club was inaugurated. The President and Founder is Lord Northcliffe, not unknown in Newfoundland. Formerly H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught was Patron, but recently His Majesty the King graciously consented to fill that position. In a little magazine just published by the Hon. Secretary, E. Wrench, Esq., he says: "I am often asked to explain in a few words the aim and object of the Overseas Club, and I confess to find a suitable and sufficient reply is no easy task. I usually reply as follows:—

"The Overseas Club is a vast brotherhood and sisterhood of men and women to whom the mission and world purpose of the British Empire is a religion, who believe that imperialism means not merely flag-waving but the carrying out of the greatest task ever given to mankind."

The four chief objects of the Overseas Club are:

1. To help one another.
2. To render individual service to our Empire.
3. To maintain our Empire's supremacy upon the seas and in the air.
4. To draw together in the bond of comradeship British people the world over.

Members' Creed.

Believing the British Empire to stand for justice, freedom, order and good government, we pledge ourselves as citizens of the greatest Empire in the world to maintain the heritage handed down to us by our fathers.

The Overseas Club is strictly non-party, non-sectarian and recognizes no distinction of class.

It is not an organization for only those born in the United Kingdom as is sometimes erroneously stated. At present there are over 135,000 members living in every part of the habitable globe, and there are branches in almost every country where there are enough British subjects to form one. One of the largest branches is in the world which has over 1,000 members is at Shanghai, China. China has fourteen branches. One very large branch is at Melbourne, Australia, and another Dunedin, N.Z.

The activities of the Overseas Club are extremely varied. One of the primary objects is to instill patriotism in the minds of the young.

The monthly meetings take the form of social gatherings such as debating and literary clubs, lectures, dances, etc.

All attempts to emphasize class distinction are contrary to the spirit of the Association. The headquarters of the Overseas Club are in the general buildings, Aldwych, London, W.C. in the very heart of the great city.

Members' Privileges.

Amongst the privileges of members are the right to have their correspondence addressed in care of the Overseas Club, the use of telephone free service, information bureau, and free advice in legal matters. Members of a local branch of the Overseas Club are recognized by the central committee and have all the privileges of London membership.

As soon as a hall for the use of the club is secured, we hope to have a lecture, the proceeds of which will be given to our Women's Patriotic Association.

The Club hopes in the not far distant future to open a reading room for the use of members and visiting friends.

SECRETARY.

Stafford's Prescription "A" cures Indigestion, Dyspepsia, Gastritis and Nervous Dyspepsia. Price 25 and 50c. bottle. Postage 5 & 10c. extra.—jan5,16

Without Pure Blood Health is Impossible.

Owing to faulty action of the kidneys and liver, the blood becomes filled with disease germs that imperil health.

The first warnings are back-ache, dizziness, headache and lack of energy. Act quickly if you would avoid the terrible ravages of chronic kidney complaint. Get Dr. Hamilton's Pills to-day; they cure kidney and liver troubles for all time to come. No medicine relieves so promptly, cures so thoroughly. For good blood, clear complexion, healthy appetite, use that grand health-bringing medicine Dr. Hamilton's Pills. Get a 25c. box to-day.

Amusements.

GREAT MELO-DRAMA AT THE NICKEL.

The delightful programme at the Nickel Theatre yesterday was well attended, both at the afternoon and evening performances. The "Who Pays?" episode, entitled "For the Comedy," was most impressive. Ruth Roland and Henry King were the principal characters in this brilliant subject, excelled themselves. Another striking picture is the powerful two-part melo-drama "When the Tide Came In," by Thomas G. Chatterton and an all star cast. This picture is true to life and all should see it. The comedy is one of the funniest ever seen at the Nickel and it kept all in roars of laughter. It will be repeated this evening and we feel certain will draw the usual large Saturday night audiences. Monday there will be another elaborate programme.

BRITISH THEATRE.

The leading photo-play at the British last night was "The Blood of His Brother." It was a good lively drama and was thoroughly enjoyed by all present. The balance of the show was also good. The matinee this afternoon will be a special one, consisting of eleven reels, and ought to prove a big attraction for the children. "The Black Box" and the great 4-reel drama "Court Martial" will be included for the benefit of those who were unable to see this picture before. The show will be continuous and patrons should go early. The two big features will be shown after the intermission.

AT THE CRESCENT.

Five feature pictures constitute the big programme the Crescent Picture Palace is showing to-day, the productions of the best people in the business. "To the Death" is a Vitagraph feature the story of a Virginia feud, a dramatic and impressive lesson that we should be slow to anger, to live and let live. Pat O'Malley features in McQuade of the Traffic Squad, an Edison story of city life. "The Strength of Samson" is a Selig spectacular drama. "Her Convert" is a strong Biograph drama, and "The Bachelor's Burglar" is an Essanay comedy. Mr. Dave Parks sings a patriotic ballad, "My Red Rose Girl Farewell." Don't miss seeing this big week end show.

AT THE CITY HALL.

The weekly session of the Municipal Board was held last night. Chairman Gosling and Messrs. Ayr, Morris, Anderson, McNamara, Mullaly, McGrath, Withers and Jackman.

A cheque for $80, sent by His Excellency the Governor for improvements to Banerman Park was acknowledged with thanks. A new fountain will be erected in the Park out of the amount.

A communication was received from Mr. F. Blackall re shortage of water and the rights of a taxpayer. The matter was referred to the Engineer.

Two members of the sanitary staff, Stevenson and Sullivan, were reported to be unable to work through accidents. The Insurance Company will be advised to pay the weekly amount guaranteed.

The Martin Hardware Company asked if the Board intended to purchase a new steam roller. Referred to Engineer.

A. H. Caldwell asked for the position of City Impounder. His application was filed.

An anonymous letter asking for a light at the corner of William Street and Hayward Avenue was relegated to the waste paper basket.

The reports of the Engineer, Sanitary Supervisor