THE LILY OF THE STRATH.

'There ye are, wrang, sir—there ye are rrang,' said Ned, as his eye kindled and his rown cheek flushed with enthusiasm, 'Nae oot there are times when I am no just sae reel set, when I'm baith cauld and wat and ungry, and hae tae mak' my bed at the back weel set, whem I'm baith cauld and wat and bungry, and hae tae mak' my bed at the back o' a dike, or below a haystack, but that's only whan I'm far awa' in the solitudes, wi'n ac hooses near, no even a clay biggin' or a shepherd's shealin' tae sheiter in. For the maist pairt, sir, I'm as cosy and comfortable as a bing, and far happier I believe than ony throned and seeptred monarch. A'body is the friend o' Wanderm' Ned, and gang where I like, I am aye made welcome. After a lang day's wanderin', I may be tired and wearied, but the first farm place I come tae'! am shure o' a seat by the ingle nuik, a cog o' parritch and cream, and a saft bed in the strae barn, forbye kind words and blythe looks frae auld and young. And then, sir, think o' the joy tae be a free wanderer owre this bonny land o' ours, wi' its mountains and its muirs, its wuds and rivers and glens where a' is grand and beautifu'. Eh, sir, mony's the time when wanderin' a' my lane owre the Muir, wi' the lavrock singun' high in the lift, and the bee hummin' amang the owre the Muir, wi' the lavrock singun' high in the lift, and the bee hummin' amang the nurple heather, and the little burnies glancin' and murmurin' in the sunshine, and a' Natur' rejoicin' in the sunshine, and a' Natur' rejoicin' in the suniles o' the Creator, I hae thochts and feelin's which tak' me out o' mysel' a'thegither, lift me into a divine rapture, and I can das naething but lay mysel doon on the gowany sward and wi' very gladness greet.'

'Give me your hand, my noble fellow ?' exclaimed the youth, with an outburst of warm

Be sure I shall find no difficulty in fending, answered Denman, with a laugh; 'I have learned ere now to accommodate myself to circumstances.'

Weel, it's a grand thing tae be able tae dae that, 'said Ned, approvingly. 'Let me see, Mrs. Carrick has a spare room, and she's a cleanly body. Maybe ye could lodge wi'her. I'll show ye her hoose as we gang doon.'

"Tae both perfectly. Is the ruin a fine one?"
Tae them that ha'e a taste for the like it is weel worth lookin' as Mony an hour I sit lookin' at its anid arches and carred window hales, and think o' the auld time when it was great and prosperous. I'm maist the only ane that daur gaug near it, for Maister M'Quirk has forbidden the folk tax vesti it noo; but atweel he has nae richt tae hinder them. Only ye see he has a' the poor, and the folk daurna offend him. As for me, I carena for his prohibition, and gang owrethe gate he has locket whenever I please."
Is this Mr. M'Quick the proprietor? asked Demman, with a pardonable duplicity, for well he knew the fact of which he affected to be ignorant!

'Yes, I am a stranger,' was the reply. This is the first time my eyes have fighted on Strathmee, and I am enchanted by its loveliness. I have just waked over the hills from Strawhead, and when that splendid vision burst upon me I was constrained to lie down and admire it.

'Ay, the Strawhead, and when that splendid vision burst upon me I was constrained to lie down and admire it.

'Ay, the Strawh is a bouny place, sir. often think its the bonniest place I see in a my wanderin's. Ye'll be travellin' just forpleasure? He atted, with a touch of this curiosity which all country people feel at the sight of a stranger.

'Well, yes—partly for pleasure. I am somethin of a wanderer, like yourself. Juy name is William Denman. My relatives are dead, and I am alone in the world. I am somethin of a wanderer, like yourself.
