She laughed, a little touch of nervousness in the voice, but drew her slights aside and sat down on the bench.

"Do you think you can deceive me by such play-acting?" she asked eagerly. "You are no man of wood. Tell me, is there nothing you care to ask me after—after al! these years?"

Hamlin lifted his eyes and looked at her, stirred into sudden interest by the almost caressing sound of the soft voice. "Yes," he said slowly, "there are some things I should like to know, if thought you would answer frankly."

"Try me and see."

"Then my guess is true and you are not so devoid of curiosity," she laughed. "My answer? Why, it is simplicity itself—because I was never Mrs. Leeve, but am rigifully Mrs. Dupont."

"Do you mean you were never married to the Fevre?"

"What else could I mean?"

"Then he lied."

She laughed, a little touch of nervousness, saide and weat bearinged how to fight in the past few years—heaven knows I have had opportunity—and rather enjoy the excitement. How far would your word go with Melly, do you think? Or with the Major."
