HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

BY MAY CHRISTIE
Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate

II.—A Glimp of Diamonds

"Have you seen Alice lately?" asked Tony Lascelles with a serene, cool gaze and he had the grace to look a little awkward.

"Yes—that is, a few days ago." "Looking as pretty as ever, I suppose?" I spoke abstractedly.

"She isn't a patch on you for looks, fair Helen of Troy?" He threw me a killing eye.

"Why the tute?" I asked pertly. "Tony smirked ingratiatingly as he made answer."

"Because Helen swayed the hearts of men." "I do not envy her," I rejoined in a flat, conclusive tone that knocked the romance out of the occasion.

"The last drew up outside Rumpelmeyer's. We descended."

"Tony kept close beside me as we waded into the tearoom. If it weren't for the fact that I was rather pale, I should have been accused of vanity."

"I should state that he is childishly fond of playing escort to pretty, well-dressed women."

"We found a table in a prominent place, and Tony, who I prefer to call Helen, sat down to it with him on the occasion."

"Helen, you do look stunning! He gazed at me with a gleam in his eye. He was wearing a hat, impeccably gloves and shoes, then looked comically around the room as though to say:

"Decidedly smart woman, isn't she?" "I know myself."

"The waiter came with tea and cakes, I fussed among the cups and saucers. Tony's champagne-colored eyes were fixed on me."

"He leaned across the table and incontinently brushed against my hand. 'Helen, you do never feel a little lonely in that little flat of yours, all by your ownself?'"

"A quick, sharp pain contracted my heart. He had touched me on the raw. 'Lonely in my little flat? Dear heaven! I had not wept bitterly today for hours, through utter loneliness? Now Jim had gone, I felt I never wished to see the place again!'"

"Why do you ask?" I stammered, taken aback.

"Because you know I'm tremendously interested in you," said Tony, in the coolest, soothing tones he keeps especially for pretty women. "And I think you're too charming to become—er—"

"I tilted up my face provocatively. Two could play at this game."

"What a lovely suggestion!" he responded promptly. "Helen, you're much too beautiful to be so easily won."

"And unprotected?" I smiled a little wistfully. Tony's remark had stirred up memories.

"But he went blundering on. 'You need a husband. Suppose—oh, I'd look after you most awfully well, wouldn't I?'"

"I thought of the good times we had in my little flat? Dear heaven! I had not wept bitterly today for hours, through utter loneliness? Now Jim had gone, I felt I never wished to see the place again!'" hand to emphasize some point, a glint of diamonds on her wrist caught my attention. I looked again. I caught my breath.

"You were not mistaken! The jeweler had sent the other model out to Canada. This—this was the watch for which Jim had forged his father's name—Alice was wearing it on her wrist—Alice was the unknown woman for whom he'd bartered all our happiness!"

Tomorrow—An Invitation to Visit Alice. If it had been Jim now—Jim with his handsome face and debonair, attractive ways! Any woman must succumb to him. I, of all people, knew that well!
