Ingram started to go home, but after Ingram started to go home, but after proceeding west on Talbot street he returned to the Talbot Hotel. Constable McKeown met him again, and seeing that he would not go home, placed him under arrest. The complainant resisted arrest and fought furiously with the onstable, and in the struggle he was injured on the head. These injuries were caused by reason of Ingram resisting his arrest.

The constable, declares the commission, used no greater force than was necessary to accomplish his arrest, as complainant was a powerful man. And the constable was at all times acting quite within the scope of his duty.
In the analysis of the evidence given at the inquiry the commission found that there were three cuts on the com. plainant's head, but these could not have been caused by the policeman's mmission says, a bruise and not a cut

The statement of Ingram that he was struck in the first struggle is not borne out by the facts, declares the board. If the constable were putting on the handcuffs on the complainant at that time the constable would need the use of both hands. Mayor Brinkman thought that Constable McKeown should have old at the inquiry that he had hit the complainant. The other members reninded the mayor that Constable Mc-Keown had sworn he did strike Ingram, ut it was not on the head.

Sheriff McGhee had been careful to spread the information that the execution would take place far later than it did. Not more than fifty people, principally from the country, by automobile, scanned the jail walls, morbidly expecting to see the uprights and the bar of the scaffold above the wall, but not from any high point of vantage could they see a trace. In the comments heard everybody especially noticed this, comparing it favorably with the crowds everybody especially noticed this, com-paring it favorably with the crowds when Burchell was hanged.

Executioner Ellis left the Oxford Hotel, accompanied by a few reporters at 4:30 a.m., crossing Dundas street and along Graham street to the jail, amid a glad chorus of birds, of which the joyous flutings of the robins were the dominant notes. On the bowling green beside the southern jail wall, etween the court house and the bac gate, dozens of robins, their red breasts brightly contrasting with the moist green grass, were pulling up the early

Shortly before her departure, Garfield's mother received a long distance call from a woman in Toronto, who, judging from her hysterical tone of voice, was apparently demented, assuring her that the murderer would not go to the gallows. She claimed to be a relative of the Duke of Devonshire, who she claimed was attending to the matter. Mrs. Garfield is reported to have told her that she would meet her in Toronto, and that meanwhile the wires to Ottawa would be made hot. May Be Demented.

GARFIELD'S LAST WORDS.
Woodstock, June 2.—Norman Garfield's last words before he marched to the scaffold referred to his brother. Denton, now doing 20 years in Kingston. "Denton will see Trix today, and he will see me also, and he can choose between us." The brothers have been cnemies ever since Denton confessed and sent his brother to the gallows. Trixie Garfield, Denton's wife, stated here Wednerday that she would be in Kingston today with Denton, when "Norm" was being hanged, and evidently the knowledge of this fact prompted the above remark. Another statement before leaving the death cell was: "I never intended to shoot Mr. Johnson. It was not a deliberate murder."
