In fact the press of each party refer to it apologetically as a somewhat dangerous experiment made necessary by a previous enactment making school attendance compulsory. As The Newcastle Chronicle says: "It was felt that when the state had gone so far as to say that a parent must send his children to school it must go a little his children to school it must go a little further and provide him with a school to send them to. While this view gained its point, it did not appease the doubts entertained by public men who feared that it was unwise for the State to assume duties naturally belonging to the parents. The law compelling parents to send children to school has been more stringently enforced in England than in Ontario. And it meant vastly more there than here, for the pupil when forced to school had to pay his fees, and this caused children frequently to go without food. more there than here, for the pupil when forced to school had to pay his fees, and this caused children frequently to go without food In Ontario the schools are essentially public and supported by the State; attendance is compulsory, for the State demands that for its titay it shall secure an educated populace; and to improve the symmetry of the system. The surprise was therefore very great when it was found that his confession was made to the collector of customs and two other peasons connected with the Government, and although the district attorney was not present it is presumed that he considered himself bound by the promise of immunity held out by the others, and accordingly gave his assent to the release of the prisoner.
