

GRANTLEY MANOR

A TALE

LADY GEORGINA FULLERTON,

CHAPTER IX.

But be merciful to the sinner, while you condemn the sin! Believe that, notwithstanding the strongest and most conclusive appearances of guilt, there may be—excuses, perhaps, or—

Margaret waved her hand impatiently: "Ginevra wrung her own, and gazed upon her as if she would have read into her soul. She then stood before her, and in a tone of voice gentle, but firm, addressed her thus—

"Margaret, it signifies little whether it be through my fault or through my misfortune that your hopes, and what you now call your happiness, are destroyed. You never can be Edmund Deville's wife; and never, even in your most secret thoughts, must you allow yourself to think of him as a husband or a lover. I care not what you think of me. I care not now what impression you carry away with you, nor how you treat me in future, nor how you speak of me to others; but this conviction you must carry with you when you leave this room, and never lose it again as you have done all that you believe me to have done."

Margaret started up, caught her sister's hands, and with an eagerness amounting to violence, exclaimed—"Tell me what you mean. When you wept and kissed my hand just now, I thought you guilty. Now you speak with a strange audacity, and I could almost fancy you to be innocent. If you do so, speak, speak, Ginevra. Tell me any tale you choose, and I will believe it, or else let me leave the room and never trust in any one again."

"Go," said Ginevra, calmly and solemnly, "and never ask me again to speak of myself. Only remember my words, and lay them to your heart. Our paths of duty are different, and though we may live together, if that should be allowed, we must never forget that an invisible barrier has risen between us, which you cannot—and I dare not—remove. If, with a great patience and a holy trust, you will bear with me, and suspend hard thoughts and abstain from harsh words, it will be a great and wonderful effort of virtue; and hereafter, my sister, you will be glad to think that you did not break a bruised reed—but if you cannot, then let God's will be done. Be it trial, or be it punishment, I am ready to receive at your hands far more readily than I have inflicted upon you. Only she stopped, hesitated, clasped her hands in supplication, and then, with a burst of such agony as she had not given way to before, exclaimed—"only spare my father!"

Margaret held out her hand without looking at her; but as she was leaving the room she returned impetuously, flung herself into her sister's arms, and both wept with uncontrollable emotion; and when these two fair creatures parted it was with a heavier weight of sorrow on their spirits that such young hearts are often doomed to endure.

When Margaret awoke on the following day, after two or three hours of restless and feverish sleep, she felt totally unequal to the labors of the day—that heavy labor especially of entertaining friends, and disguising her own feelings; but the recollection that others would connect her illness, if she admitted it, with Neville's departure, gave her strength to rouse herself, and to submit to her dread of encountering the eyes of her family; the presence of her father, and above all, the flippant remarks and sharp interrogatory glances of Maud Vincent. As she passed the hall-clock, she started at perceiving how late she was, and hurried into the breakfast room. Ginevra was in her place making tea, and looking perfectly calm, though paler than usual. She silently put within her sister's reach whatever she wanted for her breakfast; and at the moment that Mrs. Thornton was about to cross-question her grand-daughter about her looks, which certainly were not satisfactory, she diverted that lady's attention by a well-timed inquiry about the efficacy of some homoeopathic powders administered the day before to the schoolmaster's wife. Maud was watching Margaret, partly from curiosity, and partly from real interest; she could not form any conjecture that satisfied her as to the state of things which Edmund had left behind him, and she was long to be alone with her, that they might talk over his departure, and form plans for circumventing the enemy, as in her own mind she designated Ginevra. But this was not easily achieved; when they moved into the drawing-room, both the sisters sat at the same table, and Maud's efforts to induce Margaret to withdraw were where with her were vain. She had watched her pencils and her colors, and began painting some figures in her sketch-book with a resolute application that baffled all attempts at conversation, and grew provoked, and asked Walter Rodney if he had seen Mr. Neville before she started. He said he had not; he was out by six o'clock, he believed; and he had looked at Margaret. No blush was on her cheek, but her lip slightly quivered, and she gave, perhaps unconsciously, an expression of scorn to the face she was painting. Mr. Warren came into the room at that moment, and after taking up a newspaper for an instant, and playing with the ears of the dog for another, he came up to the table, and said to Ginevra—"Put on your things, signorina, and come and look at the skaters in the park." To Margaret's surprise Ginevra instantly consented, and she to the room to prepare for walking. It was a glorious winter's day, and the sun was shining brightly. Mr. Warren was waiting on the steps of the terrace, and when Ginevra appeared at the hall-door and walked towards him, he said to himself, "now for it," like a man who is going to pull the string of a shower-bath. (To be continued.)

HE HAS A BIG HEAD. and no mistake, but we can fit it, or any other head for that matter. It's a matter of importance to you to look at our stock of HATS before you make a purchase. Know what to buy before you do so. You can't half appreciate the new styles until you look over our collection. When you've done that, it'll be as easy as falling down to make up your mind what your new hat will be. It'll be a daisy. It bought at our store.
