

the great interest and the abiding goodwill of all the other countries, because we all have so much at stake. As I have said here before it may be a question of whether civilization continues or whether the whole world blows up. Here is the key problem in trying to see that mankind follows the only sensible alternative of these two alternatives.

If we take this attitude, I am confident that the results may surprise even the most optimistic delegates here today.

S/C