the world should never forgive. Is it?

Yet it's this same Sinn Fein, pro-German spirit that today is bidding for our sympathy and support.

And this so-called distress in Ireland is not because of my real famine or necessity, for like ourselves, in failing to do her full duty during the war, Ireland suffered least and prospered most, but a condition voluntarily created, and in every way exaggerated, to deceive Uncle Sam and get that sympathy, and its naturally accompanying cash contributions, majority of which dollars unquestionably go into supplies of whatever nature will best work out their mu#derous desire to still---Knife old England-' We are too familiar with the Irish temperament to question that there's trouble over there, in fact one could more reasonably question if there ever was a time when there wasn't.

The old saying that Ireland's the only country on the globe willing to fight without a cause, is probably well grounded, for wherever that temperament rubs up, friction is sure to follow, a fact of which England herself is only too well aware. And if Ireland wasn't permanently anchored, I'd wager that England would be first to volunteer to tow her across and hitch her on to Uncled Sam's troubles gratis, and gladly pay a big bonus for the privilege.

Fortunately for Uncle Sam, but unfortunately for England, Ireland's a fixture, and England's got to face the facts-"as they are." And, she too, fully realizes that her own salvation lies in the continued control of Ireland, not alone for her own, but for the best good of that entire bunch of Isles.

For there could no more be peace in the British Isles with Ireland independent than there could be with an Englishman pleading in the best interests of mankind before Boston's City Council. Irish Animosity would guarantee that.

Trouble there'll always be over there, but less of it with Ireland
