

from ours upon religion and morals and politics and social adjustment will apparently prevail, we may expect, if the race advances, the steady confirmation of the great Pilgrim and Puritan principles, which rest society and government upon the development of the individual citizen, because the displacement of Frontenac was a surmounting of the fleur-de-lys and the banners of France not merely by the standards of the republic, but by the kingliness of intellectual man.