He was looking at her with a curious expression in his eyes.

"I am not sure if I am very useful," he answered slowly, "but I am quite/sure that I will gladly be of use to you if ever you have need of me."

"Now, that is very nice of you," said Drusilla, "and you mustn't b'ame me if I take you at your word. Well, I think I will go and see how Beth is. Good-bye, Mr. Keston. Then in the next breath Drusilla demanded: "Must she come here? I won't have her worrying you. If she has anything nasty to say, let her ow wait and say it later."

"I am convinced," said Drusilla, "that Aunt Edith has done something. "that Aunt Edith has done something. The prevent Connie coming. Beth dear, we must really have this out! It is all very well imagining this, and supposing that, but why should Aunt Edith be so catty? I was going to say beastly, but I suppose I had better not, although a cat is a beast, isn't it?"

Then in the next breath Drusilla flared into a hot temper, and took the letter to her sister.

"So after all you are educating me!"
She dabbed her eyes anxiously, and then looked at him. "Do I look as if I had been crying? I don't want Beth to ask questions, because I don't know how to answer them, unless I say to her I am weeping because Mr. Keston says I am a mass of selfishness."

"That," he answered, smilling with difficulty, "is not the truth."

Drusilla rolled her handkerchief inte a ball, and stuck it into her belt. Her frivolous mood, though it was not quite the real thing, came back to her fortunately at this moment.

"You really are a useful person to have in the house," she said. "I shall treat you as a kind of clock, and, when I feel doubtful, I shall come and see whether I am doing right or wrong."

Said, "but mother has put it into her har has put it into her har has put it into her har has put it into her has been crying? He told us of your decision to be married quietly, and so much sooner; and I want you set to him. Miss Lingfield underlined the word; and Drusilla understood the other girl's eager desire to try and smooth away, if possible, the disagreeable feelings which Mrs. Mingfield's peculiar manner has aroused.

"You really are a useful person to have in the house," she said. "I shall treat you as a kind of clock, and, when I feel doubtful, I shall come and see whether I am doing right or wrong."

The news, however, that Connie was not coming, and that her stepmother might be expected, was most unpalatable.

Drusilla flared into a hot temper,

PEARY ON THE ROOSEVELT AT wistfully.

Miss Heronworth made no answer to this tirade. Truth to tell, she felt unequal to deal with the situation. Her uncle's death had been a veritable anguish, followed by a sense of lassitude and weakness such as had never come to her before. Edmund Lingfield had assured Beth more than once that there was nothing among his private papers which could lead to the discovery of the secret they held so precious; and there were times when Bertha Heronworth found the herself clinging to the hope that her fears might only be the phantoms of her imagination, and that her aunt's present attitude might after all merepalatory which had characterized her throughout her life.

OTHER HIT AT H. H. H. tell you that I object very strongly to your staying with Bertha—at any rate, just now—this may have some weight with you."

Connie Lingfield listened in silence for a little while.

She was very sad, and she was far from well. In these first bleak days of grief, she had turned to the thought of Bertha and Drusilla Heronworth and their sympathy as to a kind of haven. Though she had not as yet confessed as much to herself, she was really eager to be away from her father's wife.

"Why don't you wish me to go, mother?" she asked.

And Mrs. Lingfield gave a prevaricating reason.

"I don't consider a visit to Crowder Chase will do you any good," she said. "Bertha is so depressing. You had far better go to your cousins in Hampshire." Then she added: "Business will take me to Crowder Chase very shortly, and, as we have to start our separate lives, we serve no good purpose by being there at the same time."

And so Connie Lingfield gave way.
