

CONTENTS.

---

CHAPTER I.

Recognition of law and order in the universe—Man being only understood by recognition of his moral nature—He is created to an endless life—Man and all things created to subserve their end—The end of each thing the attainment of individual and general good, and to attain to this, all are fitted to accomplish their end—Life, an essence in organised beings, differentiated in each kind, until in man as a spiritual nature it is destined for a blessed immortality, p. 2-28.

CHAPTER II.

Harmony in nature—The manifestations of life in various beings point to the object of their creation—Their typical relationship to man—In their bodies as in their life is the prophetic declaration of man's nature—The life of man is differentiated from that of other creatures, and his moral nature constitutes the great and essential difference between himself and other created things—The ameliorating influence of man