WAS IT A MURDER?

Horrible Experience of a Famou English Surgeon.

Yhy Sir George McDonald Once Upon a Time Gave Up the Practice of His Profession for Five Years—Dis-secting a Living Man.

When the Duke of Sutherland was on his way to Florida last fall he had with him a medical gentleman who, besides his great knowledge of medicine, was a first-class reconteur. He amused the Duke's party with many anecdotes of English celebrities, says the Atlanta Constitution. One day he told the following story to explain why Sir George McDonald, the celebrated surgeon, had given up the practice of his profession for five years just when five years' practice was most valuable to him. Series practice was not provided as a man of genus, and the great eminence to which he has raised himself was confidently predicted both by his professors and his fellow students. He knew that a few years after he graduated a professor's chair would be waiting for him, and in the still more distant future were visions of wealth and honor incalculable. Suddenly it was reported through Edinburgh that McDonald, the promising young surgeon, was suffering from nervous prostration, and then the news followed that he had thrown aside his brilliant career and would practice the profession no more. The news was true. One night McDonald went home an enthusiastic surgeon, and when next seen he was evidently born down by some great secretion seemed to fill him with horror. He went abroad and for five years he remained a wanderer without occupation. Then he griet, and the mention or a surgical opera-tion seemed to fill him with horror. He went abroad and for five years he remained a wanderer without occupation. Then he was persuaded to return to Edinburgh and resume his profession. was persuaded to return to resume his profession.

"One afternoon as Dr. McDonald was leaving the lecture hall of the university he was approached by a well known purveyor of subjects and told that a man had died suddenly the day before of what was supposed to be heart disease, and for a certain consideration the body might be obtained. After a few minutes' conversation McDonald walked on and the purveyor hurried off to attend to his ghastly business.

"That night, just as the moon was rising over the top of the Edinburgh houses, an apparently empty wagon, with two men on the seat, drove up to Dr. McDonald's house. After a careful look about one of the men gave a low whistle, and almost immediately a window on the ground floor was opened. Against this window the wagon was backed, and the two men lifted a long, heavy object, wrapped in a sheet, and passed it into the house. The sound of money changing hands followed; then the window was closed and the wagon was driven hastily away.

"In lifting the heavy bundle the wrappings had been disturbed, and when Dr. McDonald turned from closing the window the monilight was shining on the pallid face of a corpse. Quickly he lit a number of lights and then drew a heavy curtain. From one side of the room he pushed a long thick, on which were dark stains, showing that it had been used many times before. On this he lifted his purchase and carefully examined it. It was the body of a man in the prime of life, and except that "rigor mertis" had set in, and that every joint was like a bar of iron, the man looked as though he were usleep. There were no signs of wasting discussed. His face was full, and, except for its ghastly pallor, looked as it did in life, it wife evident the man had died suddenly, and heart disease was the doctor's specialty. From a chest McDonald brought his instruments and glasses, his little basins and sponges, and had them out in order by the saile of the corpse. The subject died of saile of the corpse. The subject died of saile of the corpse. The subject died of saile of the corpse. The rear was the part to be examined. Just as the knife touched he man's breast Dr. McDonald sprang back with a sainted look. Was it possible that expedits had quivered! No; it was only me passing draft which had made the healt flicker over the dead face, but still he could make sure. There was no pulse, very thing proved the man was dead become and had saide. At last the diseased art, which had been the cause of death, y revealed. All this had taken time and land side and to me acceptance and his head to the throwto's greathent.

that face the eyes were closed, and it was the expressionless face of the dead; now all was changed. The eyes were open and were glaring at him with a horrid expres-tion of reproach. At the same instant the sion of reproach. At the same instant the body on the table rose slowly to a sitting posture, and the perfect stillness of the room seemed broken by a single whispered word, 'murderer.' With his eyes glued to the mutilated form Dr. McDonald staggered back until he felt the wall behind him and could retreat no further. For full two seconds those eyes glared at the doctor, and the air seemed to resound with that awful accusation. In that time he realized that the man never had been dead, and had known and felt every event of that horrible might. Then the mutilated body felt back. Shriek after shriek filled the house. The sleeping family, awakened by this foreafful Shrick after shrick filled the house. The sleeping family, awakened by this dreadful noise, rushed down. They found Dr. McDonald just outside his office door, with his arms stretched out, barring the passage. Don't go in! Don't go in! he shricked, and then fell insensible. Before daylight the same two men backed their wagon against the doctor's window, and the bundle, wrapped in a sheet, was passed out to them, but Dr. McDonald was delirious upstairs."

ANTOCEANTHEROINE.

She Conquered Mutiny on Shiph Saved Her Husband. She Conquered Mutiny on Shipboard and Saved Her Husband, water which divides the States of Connecticut and New York, in the village of Port Chester, in a pretty cottage, resides a little woman of unassuming manners, whose deed of heroism, says the New York Press, will live as long as stories of the sea are read and deeds of provess cited for the emilation of others. 4 January 3, 1885, a little after midnight, and on the ocean nearing St. Helena, was the good American ship Frank N. Thayer, commanded by Captain Robert K. Clark. Soon after the midnight watch was changed the captain was roused from a sound sleep by hearing his name called in a tone of alarm.

by hearing his name called in a tone of alarm.

Fearing that all was not right with his ship he hurried up the companion-way in his night-clothes. As his head appeared above the companion-way he received a number of stabs in the face, neck and head, but he managed to see that his assailants were two Manilla Indians, members of his crew.

He fell to the floor beneath, where the Indians followed him and plunged their knives into his side, leaving him for dead. The carpenter, the lookout man and mate were killed. The balance of the crew were locked in or terrified, and the captain, his wife and daughter were left to the mercy of the infuriated Manilla Indians.

The captain, faint from the loss of blood, was assisted to the cabin by his wife. One of the lungs of the officer was protruding. The brave woman, with a nerve as firm as adamant and with a care as guarded as that of the skilled physician, forced the vital parts back and sewed up the frightful wound. She then bandaged his face and head and set herself to the task of making their position safe by securing the windows to the cabin, arming herself, and placing the wounded captain in a position to defend or assist in the defense of the cabin.

The precaution was taken just in time, for, tiring of the vigil they had kept about the captain's cabin, they determined to finish him. But he and the intrepid woman at his side repelled the mutineers, who had broken open the cabin window.

What words can describe the courage of this wife, who stood with firm hand by her husband's side, ready to do or die, hearing meanwhile the tread of the Indians himself of the wife and captain, were at last urged to action. One of the Indians himself over one of the wife and captain, were at last urged to action. One of the Indians himself over one of the wife and captain, were at last urged to action. One of the Indians himself overboard. The other sought refuge in the hold, and when dislodged it was found that he had set the ship on fire. He jumped overboard and was lost.

Then came renewed heroism on the part of the wife. Tenderly the loved captain was placed in a boat, and after a long and tedious sail of seven hundred miles they reached the island of St. Helena, having been nine days adeft in a boat insufficiently provisioned, with a man almost cut to pieces. But the brave woman was the master spirit of the shipwrecked, and to-day she is pointed out as the brave wife of the equally brave Captain Robert K. Clark.

How Schamyt's scienter Came into the Possession of a Russian.

Here is a story told by an esteemed fellow-citizen to a New York Star reporter; "When I sat dows to breakfast in Deimonico's I noticed at the other side of the table a queer-looking, gaunt-faced old man, who did not seem at ease in his suit of New York clothes. After a time I made a friendly approach to him by offering him a small ourtesy at the table, accompanied by a few words. He did not understand English, but I found that he spoke French in a curious way. We struckup an acquaintance, and before our coffee pots were emply we were on confidential terms, which seemed to give him great pleasure. He was a stranger in New York, to which place he had just come, and did not know any body in the city. "He grew so friendly that after break."

him great pleasure. He was a stranger in New York, to which place he had just come, and did not know any body in the city.

"He grew so friendly that after breakfast he invited me to a room which he had taken the previous day. He there told me that he was a Calmuck in the Russian service, and that during a leave of absence he had come to New York, which he had been anxious to see. I noticed a pair of Turkish trousers hanging on the wall, and beside them a curved short sword of peculiar form, and destitute of the regulation hilt or handle. As I looked at it he said: Take it down, draw out the scimiter, 'and you'll find a thumbring by which it can be used.' I did as he directed, found the ring spoken of, grasped the weapon and began to handle it. While doing so I bent it, and noticed that, instead of springing back when the pressure was taken off, it returned gradually to its proper form. It had evidently been forged from an untold number of steel rings welded together like old Damascus blades. When asked about it he told a curious tale.

"One day,' he said, 'forty years ago, when I was in the Caucasus under Voronoff, a cloud of Circassian cavalry under Schamyl suddenly came upon us in a pass. A Gircassian with a drawn scimitter galloped toward me, said raised my sword to guard my head, but he cut it in twain with a single stroke as he would have cut a carrot. At that moment his brain was pierced by one of our Calmuck bullets, and I sprang from my horse to get his scimitor. Next morning Schamyl sent a messenger to our camp to ask General Voronzoff for the body of his brother, who had been killed in the previous day's fight, and he asked also for the scimiter, which, however, could not be found. That is it. It had been an helricom in the family of Schamyl, the Mohammedan prophet, was said to be seven hundred or eight hundred yoars old, and had probably been made in the Caucasus out of Damascus steel."
