The Western Line.

(Verses Written in an Artillery Observation Post During a Relief: Flanders, May, 1915). By Xanthus, in Ottawa Journal.)

Thor draws a cord invisible Across the shaking sky; hear the tearing of the shell, The bullets sing and cry. As charging through the flames of hell The batteries go by.

The gunners laugh about the task That man to man has given; Like Titans now the guns unmask
And fire the veils of heaven.
Above the cloud what lights are gleaming? God's batteries are those, Or souls of soldiers homeward stream-

The floods of battle ebb and flow,

The soldiers to Valhalla go! They say that, when the day awoke And the dying night was wan, Harry of England rode the smoke And led the English van; And bowmen in the battle-glare Rose from the ghostly dew:

The cloth-yard sang upon the air
And the gray goose-feather flew!
Harry of England is awake, His archers mind not trench or stake! Beyond the flaming line, Far from this sky of echoing bronze,

The English valleys shine, The gardens moated in the wolds By wind and water kissed And dainty girls that England folds
In sunshine and in mist.
The floods of battle ebb and flow, The soldiers to Valhalla go!

The soldier has his girls to love. And he has his rum to drink, But when the lines of battle move He has little time to think; ometimes he wins a victory, Sometimes the battle ends, And there the paths of glory lie Where lie the soldier's friends. The floods of battle ebb and flow, The soldiers to Valhalla go!

The fighting men go charging past With the battle in their eyes, The fighting men go reeling past Like gods in poor disguise: The glorious men whom none will see No wife or mother more, Winged with the wings of Victory And helmeted by Thor! Above the cloud what lights are gleaming? God's batteries are those, Or souls of soldiers homeward stream-To banquet with their foes?

Barred From The Feast.

(From. the Boston Transcript.) The exchange of telegrams between King George and President Poincare about Shakespeare is a picturesque proof that even in the midst of the roar of the guns at Verdun and Dixmude, the French and British nations can turn aside to celebrate a "literary" event. The significance of Shakespeare to England is well known to all the world. What was his significance to France? President Poincare comends him because he has "made France familiar with the eternal soul of a friendly people." This is a fine phrase, and true, for Shakespeare is a searchlight upon the soul of his own nation. But it is probable that France nation. But it is probable that France has never derived very much from Shakespeare directly. He is not gay enough, and may be said to be too dreamy, too northern, for the French comprehension. That is not the case with the German people, who have, through Schlegel's amazing translation, probably the greatest success in all literature in the transferrence of all literature in the transferrence of an author's works from one language to another, made Shakespeare their own. It is a great matter for sorrow, the absence of the German people— and by this we mean the people, and not a the German rulers or the fanatic professors who have made the war the absence of the German peoplepossible-from the honors that are now being paid to the name of Shakespeare. Under normal circumstances, and in a Europe unbedevilled by Hohenzollern ambition and divine right, the German nation would be side by side with England and American in laying its laurels on Shakespeare's tomb. Out of this privilege, as well as out of their life and joy for many years, the German people have been cheated by the Prussian military cabal. 'Tis true, and pity 'tis 'tis true!

Why He Changed His Name.

In correcting the exercises of her class a teacher recently observed a new name inscribed on one of the papers- Will Evans. She looked round the the class, but could see no new boy. Not a little puzzled she requested Will Evans to stand. Up jumped Will Jones, and the teacher got more puzzled still. "Your name's Jones," she said, "not Evans!" Will looked not a little abashed, and shifted uneasily from one foot to the other. Please, ma'am," he said, "it's owing to family trouble. I didn't do it, please ma'am." "But?" she said, sternly, "I repeat your name is Jones." "Please, ma'am, said the boy, "it's changed now, Ma's, narried the lodger."
