

bridge friend. She married Mr. Augustus Barney, a young business man of Bedford. They are now living with their only son, in Richmond, Vermont.

Harvard Briggs, the youngest of the family, a bright, winsome, fun-loving boy (they were a fun-loving family), has remained in Stanbridge. He married Bertha, daughter of Mr. Cyril Chandler, a son of John Chandler, named among the founders of the Academy, one of the prominent families of Stanbridge. A younger son of John Chandler, was Joseph, who married pretty little Dora Harris, youngest daughter of Mr. Alonzo Harris, also one of the Academy founders, and an early trustee.

And still in memory they crowd around us, the dear old comrades of long ago! Zeno Whitman, one of the kindest and best, Jimmie Tree, handsome, nonchalant, and charming if he liked you, if he did not, having no use for you!

Zeno, like many others, went out to seek his fortune in the States. He returned two or three years later, from Troy, New York, with a charming wife, to live in the old home. He died years ago.

Jimmie, too, is gone. He left a very interesting family. He married his cousin, Miss Ayer, a beautiful girl, the sister of Albert A. Ayer, also of Ours, who became a successful business man in Montreal.

Dan. Tree, the rosy, smiling, black-eyed boy of Mr. Butler's day, has maintained his record for kindness of heart and general worth. He lives in Stanbridge. He has been twice married; the second time to Dora Harris, widow of Joseph Chandler; and in this sentence lies the finale of that other romance.

Lucy Tree, a blooming girl, one of the younger set of our time, is now Mrs. Cleveland, a good woman, an ardent Christian Scientist.
