LONDON LAUGHS AT STRIKE AGAINST A TRADES UNION

Fourteen Temporary Clerks Demanded Union Pay from Union and Latter Dismissed Them—Union Headquarters Picketed. (New York Times-Gazette Cable.) London, Sept. 14.—A comic and delicious Gilbertian in character is being played in real life at Union House, the London headquarters of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants. Fourteen temporary clerks, all good trades unionists, employed by the society, were dismissed at receiving only $5 a week and demanded the trade union rate of wages, which is $8.75. The demand was refused, and the clerks were ultimately dismissed. They have since been "officially" picketing the back and front entrances of Union House so that no "scabs" shall be admitted to replace them.

"In short," says one newspaper, "the heads of Union House, that temple of trades unionism and holy shrine of the anti-capitalist, behave exactly as those wicked capitalists in the outside world behave when employees become either superfluous or recalcitrant." The dismissed clerks have not only lost their employment, but have also been expelled from the society on the ground that their action is "calculated to damage the prestige of the society."

The opportunity was given them of renouncing membership if they so wished, but no apology was forthcoming, the men asserting that they had a right to picket, as they had been practically locked out and had complied with the constitutional methods recognized by the society. The executive committee of the society has sent letters to the secretaries of every branch of the society to which the erring members belong, announcing their expulsion. The humor of the situation is increased by the fact that in two cases the expelled members are branch secretaries. Moreover, most of the London branches of the society have declined their intention of supporting the expelled members' demand for the minimum rate of pay from the trade union and it is possible that the executive committee will find some branches unwilling to do so.
