We can grow them all on our own estates if we think it worth while; and, given time enough, we can grow them as well. More especially does it concern those who already possess old specimens of Canadian trees to study here the evidence of what they may come to. Take, for example, Black Walnut, which grows magnificently even near London. There is one specimen (No. 53) which is four feet seven inches in diameter, exclusive of its bark. Such timber can be had in Quebes for £71 per 1,000 feet cube. The specimen to which we now refer must be about 400 years old.
