day by day if we will only continue to shape and control our efforts in such a way as will compet the dictates of reason in every right-thinking mind to carnestly wish usencess, not only for our own wate, but in the interest of universal justice. The entire fabric of human liberty stands upon the foundation of individual right and national freedom—the national right of man to obtain access to and command of the resources of the land of a country for the sustemance of humself and family, and the right of the community to govern itself in its own way so as best to promote the moral and intellectual well being of its people. To repel these rights is an insufferable tyranny: to vindicate them is not only a human duty but a divine injunction; and among the struggling nationalities of to day ours has the proid-group of its people. To repel these rights is an insufferable tyranny: to vindicate them is not only a human duty but a divine injunction; and among the struggling nationalities of today ours has the proid-group of its people. To repel these rights, striving to win for ourselves the privileges enjoyed by nations which triumphant liberty has made peaceful and conservative, while we are asserting for others these claims which we have had to undergo in a ceaseless contest of a century's duration.

"For the past few years Mr. Parnellhas held the balance of power in the House of Commons, and the fight for Irish automomy has been chiefly there. The fortanes of electioneering war transfers this balance for sime to the hands of Hartington and Chamberlain; but it also changes the scene of action from Westminster to Ireland, where despited the might and resources of England, Irish national sentiment holds the field of an impregnable position."

tioneering war transfers his balance for a time to the hands of Hartington and Chamberlain; but it also changes the scene of action from Westminster to Ireland, where, despite the might and resources of England, Irish national sentiment holds the field of an impregnable position."

They it in the evening made a second speech, in the course of which he said the Irish people could fight their battles without an appeal to weapons. The deship of Ireland could be worked out without the aid of dynamite, but he would not pass judgment on any Irishman. However, as those in the old country had to stand the consequences they reserved the right to stand the consequences they reserved the right to suggest the means of Ireland's salvation.

Way the Queen Willies Gtacatte.

The Queen's dislike of the G. O. M. dates from 1868, and thereby hangs a very presty tale. The bill for the diseastablishment of the Irish church, having passed through parliament, only required the sovereging a mandate to become a law. It chanced that Mr. Gladstone repaired to Windsor the day that the Sill was forwarded for signature, and was admitted to additione with the Queen and the day that the sesential principle of the bill, and, while willings to concede reform, was stremunally opposed to the distruction of the Irish church. She expressed this much to Mr. Gladstone, and, as the premier thought, showed great refuctance to affix her signature to the bill. In his eagerness Mr. Ghadstone blurted out. "But madam, you must sign." The Queen of England. But does your majesty know who I am? "Yes, madam, the Queen of England. But does your majesty know who I am?" I san the people of England." It is needless to say this the Queen summarily brought the audience to a close and in a few curt world dismissed her prime minister and bade him learn better manners. Since then she has scarcely made any pretenace of conceahing her personal antipathy to the G. O. M.
