"What do you mean, father?" He drew her closer to him. In spite of all his faults he was really an honourable man; but the champagne had got the mastery of him now, and the excitement of the day and the knowledge of his own importance had gone to his head along with the wine; and in two minutes he had told Eva the thing which he had sworn never to tell her, and brought her happiness crashing to the ground in ruins. She stood quite still, her face as white as the frock from which she had just changed. She did not faint-did not even cry out. Perhaps there had always been same vague knowledge at the back of her mind, and this had only finally confirmed it. At any rate, she knew instinctively that her father had spoken the truth.

But her stunned silence awoke Mr Dennison to what he had done. He looked at her anxiously.

"It makes no difference-none at all," he said. "Philip's fond of youvery fond . . . I promised him I wouldn't tell you. Don't let him know that I had told you, my girl . . ." He said this over and over again. Eva tried to speak, but no words
