

FRENCHMAN.

As far as I can judge of the subject, I imagine such a plan of reconciliation would be likely to be attended with success, if Great-Britain were to adopt it immediately, before the mutual injuries and miseries of actual war between the two countries shall have alienated and embittered the minds of the contending parties beyond all possibility of return to their former confidence and affection. And I therefore most sincerely wish it may be followed.---But now, as we have finished the discussion of this important subject, it is time to put an end to this conversation; which I do by most heartily acknowledging the obligations I lie under to you for the pains you have taken to satisfy my, (sometimes, perhaps, inordinate,) curiosity upon the various topics that have occurred in this discourse.

The importance of adopting it without delay.

END OF THE THIRD DIALOGUE.
