By The Duchess

"Peyton" repeats he slowly ill-suppressed fury in his evil eyes; "so it was to your sister's place, to Lody Riversdale that my nicees went? It was you I suppose they had to thank for the invitation? Pray, is she aware of the honourable part you are enacting here? Does she admire

"She knows", says Peyton brus-quely "I cannot say that she admires it. You however put it out of my power to pay my addresses to you power to pay my addresses to you nicee it an open manner".

"Strange" says Dysart with a slow, insolent laugh "And so it is for you" with an exhaustive and impertinent survet of the heated, angry, honest, but certainly unbeautous conthenance of the young man before him "for you that my nicee has defied me and risked her position here. You will, of course, understand" spreading his white hands abroad with an assumption of an appologatic rir intensely irritating "that I am , unhappily, entirely ignorant of your social qualities which" with a second even more cloquent glance "must be enormous. So that you will pardon me for saying that as I look at you I em filled with emezement."

with emezoment."

Tom Peyton laughe scornfully.

He is quite eware that his present habilments do not add to the meagre habilments do not edd to the meagre stock of good looks with which a niggordly nature has supplied him.

"Handsome is as handsome does" says he quoting that vulgar homely old proverb with a valiant air. If Griselda sees good in his face, who shall dare deery it? He makes his speech with a meaning glance that implies that his beloved a uncle has signally failed in behaving handsomely towards her.

"Sh has been complaining no doubt" says Mr. Dysart catching the other's tone and casting a withering glance at Griselda. "but you—have yo behaved handsomely towards her, do you think? She is young; was it nothing to imperil her reputa-was it nothing to imperil her reputa-tion, to induce her to give up her self-respect?"

He speaks with slow malignant

He speaks with slow malignant emphasis, a dry sob breaks from Griselda. Peyton makes a step forward.

"Stop that", he says very, low, but in a tone so strange that Mr. Dysart, who, to do him justice is devoid of fear instinctively looks up at him.

"I would to Henven" says the younger men in a voice what quivers with rage. "that I could take forty years off your shoulders."

"That you might reduce m to powder?" suggests Dysart win allaugh "Let me tell you, my quon dam gardener, that if you did so you would not find me the feeble foe yo imagine. It seems a pity however to work your time over such trivial thoughts as these. The day is fast deserting us, end but a short hour or two of light remains. I feer this will secreely suffice Griselds to pook up her things" her things"
"You mean-" says Peyton, start-

That she leaves this house at day break tomorrow. Nay, not a word; she has had fair warning she cannot complain. Twice she was told what would be the end of all this. To-would be the end of all this. Tomorrow morning she leaves my house, she and her sister".

"Oh, poor Vera"! says Griselda in an agonised tone, but beneath her nreath; Peyton presses her arm tenderly warningly.

"You have got her into this scrape;
you will, of course, feel it your duty
to get her out of it", says the old man to Peyton with a cold smile full of bitter revenge. "I hope you are prepared to support her and her sister for the rest of their lives."

"It has been my desire for a long time to rescue her from her presen miserable life. For this at least I have to thank you that you have driven her to accept the home I can offer her. I would, for her sake"
with a most earnest glance at Griselda
"that it was better than it is, but though her life will, at all events,
be but a poor one, in so far as money
is concerned it will, at all events, enable her to have a soul of her own."

The proposals mark a large advance
on the provisions of the 1914 Home Rule act, or the two previous Home Rule bulls, and their promotion by men of position is regarded as significant of the growth of the Home Rule opinion and the urgency of a settlement.

will include some of the most disinguished of the workers fog Ireland.

he but a poor one, in so far as money is concerned it will, at all events, enable her to have a soul of her own."

The extreme contempt of Peyton's manner maddens the other.

"You have a proud spirit sir" he says his voice trembling with mage, "yet I think I have heard it said that the last Peyton of Girconnore is little better than a pauper."

"Then you heard wrongly" says Tom Peyton "I acknowledge myself a poor man but I never yet heard of a paupe with seven hundred a year A mere pittance in the eyes of the fashionable world I allow a begarly innome when comared with the renirolls of my ancestors, a very insufficient sum to keep up Citton nore or any home such as I would pl I'y give her, but" with a swift fond I nee at Gits Ia "will serve I think."

A dark seowl eavers the face ofthe old man; there is a touch of darry bafflement in it. He had not thought the election of the wreck of as handsome a property as making his last contemptible move with a base longing to wound, no matter by what seurcy means. "to-morrow when I turn herr adrift will you many her then, ol take her under your protection unity ou tire."

Peyton staris as if shot; his first chought is for Griselda he turns a colourless face to hers, but even if she had heard the abominable words she certainly had not understood them. There is only the same sad frightened look upon her charming face.

THE DE MILLE QUARTET.

The music of the fourth day will be furnished by this well-known Toronto Quartet, composed of Artists, all of whom are well known as Solo Singers, and accompanied by a Pianist of note. Their programmes will constitute one of the great features of Chautauqua week.

The repertoire of the quartette includes selections from the great oratorios and operas, the choicest of the English, Scotch, and Irish melodies, standard and popular songs. Not alone as a quartette do they excel, but in concerts, recitals, oratorios, and opera selections, each individual member stands distinct, having been accorded marked recognition

Kitchener Chautauqua, June 23 to 28.
