OPINION

By BARRY PARKINSON

In case you haven't noticed, there has been a swing to the right in the last couple of years. Thatcher, Reagan, Mulroney; the list goes on.

Now, we do live in democracies and, as Adlai Stevenson put it, "...in a democracy, people usually get the kind of government they deserve." (and "journalists" steal quotes from the kind of sources they deserve; I stole this one from Hunter Thompson...)

And yes, there does seem to be quite a bit of popular support for these types; but in a society where Jerry Fallwell can work millions of people into a weekly religious frenzy though the black magic of television, you begin to wonder about the qualifications of voters...Ah, but "to each his own/it's all unknown/if dogs run free." (which I swiped, incidently, from Bob Dyan.)

Running dogs; now there's a good phrase. But who do we apply it to? The "liberals" would seem to be on the run at present, although some would say that they're just in hiding, conspiring, as it were, to get back into the game and save the day. Well, maybe. The "conservatives" would also seem to provide fertile ground in which to plant this phrase: mad dogs running amok. Between the FBI and the Canadian Intelligence Service (or whatever they're calling the old I-branch of the Mounties), domestic spying seems to be back in vogue. And of course the CIA is keeping busy, as usual.

Well the rain exploded with a mighty crash'

As we fell into the sun;

An' the first one said to the second one there

"I hope you're having fun..."

-Wings/Band on the Run

Fun...yes; "101 More Ways to Neutralize Your Enemy", with style, of course.

It's odd; just when you think you've found a little peace, just when you figure you can ignore things...WHAM!, and suddenly you're dragged back to the keyboard in order to smear some more ink on an innocent piece of paper. All the hated quesitons come back come back: What's going wrong? Why did so many people not vote against Ronald Reagan? Who's to blame? What can be done? Why is the tax on alcohol so high? And typically, you're stuck. Unleash your "venom", light a candle and go soak in the bath tub....

Political Perspectives

By R. HUTCHINS

Politicians make me nauseous when they talk about jobs and the onset of high technology and tell me nothing much more than what I already know or think I know. I am left feeling that either they are hiding something or that their indecision is standard for a "non-policy" elite.

For instance, I haven't needed to be told quite as insistently as I have these past 18 months that unemployment is our number one problem. One need only look at the Monthly Statistics Canada figures to see that a lot of people are out of work. Unfortunately our government seems incapable of tackling the issue effectively. We as taxpayers paid 11 million dollars for the McDonald Commission to simply define our problems, this piece of literary dribble supplies no short term nor long term solutions to unemployment, let alone a coherent set of tenets to evaluate the issue further! And what about this "technological revolution that will save our economy. What will the transition period to higher mechanization bring to the average Canadian worker? The politicians could begin their quest for proper management of the economy by telling me what social effects they think this technological salvation may have on us, and revealing any ideas they have for cushioning the impact of technological dislocation that comes on top of an already high level of unemployment.

There is no evidence that jobs will not be lost to further mechanization. Canadians are faced with a classic catch-22 when it comes to our choices for the future. First, our unemployment rate is one of the highest in the industrialized world. Second, our productivity growth rate has actually been declining. Third, we lag a long way behind the leaders in embracing new technology, which is essential to improving productivity, hence competitiveness. The catch-22 is that we as a nation must embark on a process of further automation to catch up to our competitors (which inevitably means replacing many jobs with machines).

The experts tell us that in the long run alternatives like Industrial robots will play an important role in safeguarding employment and stabilizing the economy. Yet, these experts do not see this as a solution to large-scale unemployment. We have been living with double-digit unemployment for 3 years now, all 3 major parties endorse it as the primary political concern yet no solution seems at hand. It is perplexing to conceive what our future holds if we cannot grapple with priorities like unemployment in the present tense. None of the policies presented by government offer solutions to this problem, only alternatives to keep it from rising, therefore, it is a fact of life that we must live with such high levels of unemployment forever? I do not see politicians looking for a plausible solution. Much of this problem stems from our lack of a coherent industrial policy, one that last further than from one election to the next and supplies a goal of full employment as its main objective. Canada is faced with a widening dimishment of jobs mostly because the economy has been badly managed by successive liberal governments. Brian Mulroney's government has attempted to stimulate the economy by loosening government regulation and ownership but has yet to come up with a plausible solution to unemployment. It is my belief that big government is not willing to take measures necessary to tackle unemployment and that they have come to accept it as a fact of our industrial society. With increased technology cohesive national development policy is immediately needed. Canada must make various long-term plans to buffer the transition of our labour force to a more advanced economy, if not unemployment will continue to rise, creating wider discontent and alienation for a growing number of Canadians. Increasing eligibility and availability of Unemployment Insurance Benefits does not tackle the problem, it only acts as a further example of our economy's weaknesses and our government's gutlessness.
