The Rumseller's Prayer.

BY J. L. BECKETT.

I saw him knee! And lift his eyes to heaven as if to pray.

Had sold him rum, and now be lay
A corpse! I looked again,
A mother stood before him; she asked Him for her boy, her young and blooming boy. You sold him rum and laid him in the grave. He turned away ; yet close beside him stood A poor and ragged girl. Tremblingly. She asked him for her father. "Give Me back my father !" She reached her tremling/hand. He gazed upon the child. He could not pray He could not beg for mercy, but there rose Before his eyes, some victim of his traffic. O! could the wealth of worlds and all the gold Of eastern climes be won by rum, I ne'er should envy him who dealt it out, Destroying husbands, tathers, wives and friends, And making those whom God designed for men, Brutes to themselves and all the world besides, No! better far that poverty be mine Than wealth that's purchased at so dear a price.
