The Colonel met the look with an explanation.

We have a fellow in our regiment, he said, 'who is an incurable drunkard. Every penny he gets, very spare moment of his time, is devoted to drink. Example, warning, and advice are althrown away upon him. Punishasent also seems to be useless; and now, here I have him again on the list. He must be tried by court martial.'

Before you do that,' said Mr. Murray quietly, hand him over te me.'

'It will be a waste of time,' returned the Colonel.

That be upon my shoulders, 'and Mr. Murray; 'instead of going to extreme measures with him now, give him an or-Ve hall Dominion Day, with garland usual thing, replied the Colonel.

'Woll, give him that, and let me try my hand with him. If I fail,' said Mr.
Murray with a smile, 'try Ma by cont
martial.'

'Your offence is not in the red book, said Colonel Henderson, returning the smile; 'but I am sure you will do no good with the fellow. He is incurable. We are cuite tired of him; he gives us endless trouble and the bad example he sets the rest is fearful!'

Les me have here

Tet me have him for a week, urge Mr. Murray; 'If I fail, the man will I no worse than he is at present.' no worse than he is at present.'
You are quite mad on this hobby,
Murray,' said the Colene; 'but there
take the fellow; and if you do any good with him, I will sign the pledge myself.'
'Don't pledge yourself hastily to that,' arnestly, if you really show any good esults from the work you are about to to, I shall think there is some good in The wakened lavrock warbling springs, on fellows who are so rabid upon tem

the worse for drink.

'If so you will join us?'
'Certainly I will, Murray,' Thus the bargain was struck, and Private Capper, instead of being brought to court martial, was punished with eight days pack drill—a form of penance eight days pack drill—a form of penance he was yery familiar with.

When the first day's drill was over, and he was sitting sullenly upon the side of his bed, Mr. Murray came to him. Private Capper was in no mood for the yisit of a stranger; he was tirod and his throat was hot and parched, so when Mr. Murray took a seat beside him, he, instead of saluting him, glared angrily out of the corners of his eyes, and intered not a word.

'You seem to be very tired, my friend,' said Mr. Murray.

'I am tired—tired as a man can bo,' replied the soldier surilly.

'Marching, probably,' said Mr. Murray.

'Yos. I have,' returned Private Cap 'Yos, I have, returned Private Cap-per, growing more sullen and resentful every moment; 'the worst kind of marching a man can have.'
'And how long have you been upon this march ?' asked the visitor.
'Since eleven o'clock,' replied Cap-per.

'Halt! Who goes there?'
Private Broom brought his rifle to the 'port,' and looked keenly at a slouchine figure approaching him. It was a wild, dark, wintry evening, and a drenching sleet sweeping up from the sea, did not in any way improve the vision of the sentinel or add to his powers of hearing.
The figure made no reply, or Private Broom heard none, and shifting his weapon to the "charge," he cried again.
'Halt! Who goes there?'
The seargeant of the guard-room just as the figure came into the light of a lamp fixed upon the barrack gateway,
and by its fickering fame saw that it was one of his regiment, a soldier of Her Majesty's—th foot.
But such a soldier!
Nothing natty and neat about him;
but in lieu of the spotless uniform and well brushed hair the sergeant beheld a mud-stained jacket unbuttoned nearly to the top, solid trousers, and an infitured fees with hay dishardled and per.
'Nay,' said Mr. Murray, 'you have been upon the murch I speak of much longer than that. If I am rightly informed you have been upon the march to the top, soiled frousers, and an inflamed face, with hair dishevelled, and without a cap; but the non-commission-ed officer expressed ne surprise; he recognised his man at one.

'Drunk again, Private Capper,' he said, 'and absent without leave—yon will get into trouble, my lad, this you may look astonished, but you are more and I went night after night, taking more and more drink, until I became the downright so you see me. It's a great truth, sir, that as soon as I have naif an hout to spare I go straight to the public house. It's no use my fighting against it; as soon as my back is turned upon the barracks, I go straight to the taproon with or without sooney. "But how do you sanage without momey," asked the visitor." "Sometimes I get a little credit; but the psople of the house do." care to give that to a soldier, for they know we have nothing except our pay. But more often I find people wiling to stand treat; there are lots of young fellows who like to be seen with a soldier, and they will pay for his beer to hear him talk about the army; and I may say that I have drunk harrals of the stuff in this way. Beer and other drinks have been my roin. I am always bein and up before the commendate.

I shall break down some sconer the better I often The quiet deepairing to spoke was very touching, ray's heart bled within upon the wretched hope Murray had listened at rivate Capper be the same
