DEAR SIGNAL, - As you are probably aware that I have recently taken a trip to the "Briny," it has occurred to me that some notes of the journey and its incidents may possibly be of some in- hairs"incidents may possibly be of some interest to your readers, whose occupations do not admit of their straying so far from home. The old saying that "two is company" is nowhere more true than when on a pleasure trip, as the finest scenery loses half its beauty without some one to participate in its enjoyment. In my case I was singularly fortunate in my travelling companion. A man of large experience of the world, an old traveller in many lands, whose genial and kindly nature made light of the little occasional inconveniences of travel, and saw in them only sources of amusement, saw in them only sources of amusement, he was eminently fitted for a sociable travelling companion. Knowing his and eavy steel projectile and sighted for a mative modesty, and that he would blush under these encomiums. I shall refrain compressed air. In another place were native modesty, and that he would blush ejecting the torpedoes, in another place were the torpedoes themselves which have a bridge, which have a bridge.

round the funnel became charred by the funnel itself getting red hot, and the saloon was soon full of smoke, creating something of a flutter among some of the lady passengers. The hose was promptly turned on, however, and the inequient successing the plant of the pleasure our guide took in explaining everything, so I gazed about me in such evident astonishment and asked so many turned on, however, and the inequient successing the opinion, that if he can find no better employment, he might have served his country quite as well if he had retained his stool in Elward's office.

As the beautiful scenery of this part of the St. Lawrence has been so often described, and by far abler pens than mine, I will not weary your readers with an attempt at description, but will pass on to my impressions of the rapids, which I had never before seen. After leaving the islands about Brockville, we continued on down the river until we reached the first rapids for any account, those of the Long Sault. These, at first appearance, are the most awe-inspiring of any, extending a length of nine miles and having the roughest water of any, the "white water" being visible two or three miles before reaching them. On first striking the rapids the sea was precedence, I thought it decidedly bad in the continuation of the sea was precedence, I thought it decidedly bad about the rapids the sea was precedence, I thought it decidedly bad and received a deep cut in his doctor was at once called on the beautiful senior and clean appearance of everyty thing about the decks, the highly polish. Alas! no longer the trim, smart China clipper of old days, the ex-privateer, with a sort of saucy, man of war appsarance. Her glory had indeed departed, and she was now degraded to the level of a dirty cattle-drogher—an ocean tramp. "Sic transit, &c." I thought regretfully of the many happy days I had passed in the brave little hooker, and the many watches I had walked on her bridge some 14 years ago, and wondered what had become of my shipmates of those days—some doubtless dead, some peralla brave lost at sea, and others scattered far and wide about the world. Such is life.

Seven o'clock Monday evening found us and at one or two other places whose hames I forgot. One thing which struck me as somewhat remarkable, not only down the river, but on first seeing the French Canadian country above Montreal, was, that however small the village might be, a great big church was always the most conspicuous feature of the landscape I it is no wonder that the poor devils of habitans never get ahead, or make snything, it costs them about days—some doubtless dead, some perall they have to build their church in the first place, and nearly all they can make to keep it going afterwards. They don't lay up much private treasure on earth, has become of my shipmates of those days—some doubtless dead, some perhaps lost at sea, and others scattered far and wide about the world. Seven o'clock Monday evening found us on board the steamer Quebec, bound down the river to Quebec. Among other passengers we took on a number of the Montreal Garrison Artillery, going to Quebec for gun practice, who were action Quebec for gun practice for gun practi the next morning we saw no less than five men-of-war at anchor—three English Notes by the Way and Incidents and two French. Having some seven or eight hours to spare here we decided to visit the English flag ship, the Bellerophon, or "Bully Ruffin" as the Jack Tars call her, the flag ship of Admiral Lyons, commanding the North American squadron. In going off in the boat we passed close to the French flagship, Ia Minerye, a lumbering looking craft, painted a dirty white, and looking more like a "lobster box" than a smart friests. On going on board we were

On looking at the water, one would imagine the boat almost stationary, but this illusion is quickly dispelled by a glance at the river banks which appear to be racing by at railroad speed. While old-fashioned and obsolete, and would which I consider the finest of all, we were informed by a Montreal hotel runner, who had boarded us at Croteau Landing and who constituted that place for the day ironclads.
