With his handsome head thrown back, and an air from the last comic opera humming on his lips he led the way; Sidney, noticing as he passed through the hall, that the interior of the house was elequent of fallen fortunes and better days as the exterior The drawing-room was large, but its grandeur was of the past, the furniture and hangings were faded, the carpet old and worn, the gilding on the carving dim and lustreless.

But he had no eyes for the apart ment: every sense in his body was smitten acutely by the gracious figure of Eva Rashleigh, who came forward to greet him. It was the first time in his life he had been in the same room with a lady in evening-dress, and it seemed to him that his knees lounged into the hall. Sidney's quick trembled visibly, and he knew that his face was going from pale to red. And yet, if he had known it, she was

But the brother and cheeks-use Dr. Hamilton's Pills regsister—especially Eva—soon put him somewhat at his ease. for years; and Eva, though she did not say much to him, smiled at her brother's sallies, and when she did address Sidney, spoke to him in a pleasant and friendly fash on.

The meal, compared with those at was served in a somewhat stately fashion, and Sidney Bassington noticed that the plate was old and abundant. The table was adorned, also, with the most ex : uisite flowers, which, as he guessed, had been arranged by Miss Eva's own hands.

His nervousness grew less, and insensibly he found himself talking, asking questions, mostly about the neighbourhood and the people. Presently Eva rose, and Sir Edward rose also and opened the door for her. Sidney got to his feet, colouring painfully, for he knew instinctively that he ought to have performed that act of courtesy for her.

'Care for port, Bassington?' asked Sir Edward, as he resumed his seat.
