"Yes, but Tracy Tempest boy and man are different things," sniffed Jo-epha. "He belongs to a much high-er class than you do, Vixen, and I don't want your giddy pate to be turned by his notice."

"Lettie was angry, I know, because he did not dance with her. But I was quite glad. Serve her right for pushing me into the water to keep me from being queen!" Vixen said, laughing; then she went upstairs to remove her simple finery, carefully putting away the fading wreath of roses, to serve as a memento of this golden day.

That night she retired early to dream of the gay and varied scenes of yesterday and Tracy Tempest's dark eyes and beautiful smile. In the morning she rose with the sun to help Josepha to do up the morning chores, so as to be ready at noon for Mr. Arden, who was coming then for ner and Lettie to go up to Cedarhurst for their first sitting for the picture.

Very blithely she sung as she worked, full of happy anticipation of the afternoon's pleasure. She would be sure to see Mr. Tempest and Mr. Gre-Valle again. Pernaps even she might be introduced to handsome, indolent Mrs. Tempest and some of her elegant lady guests who had looked so grand upon the long porch yesterday. But at ten o'clock all the tasks of the morning were finished, and Vixen went out to sweep the little porch and to spend one delightful hour among the flowers, of which she was as fond as the old gardener himself, She paced up and down the narrow paths, with their pretty borders of daisies, violets, polyanthuses, and early pinks-examined the buds of her roses to see how they were swelling, exclaimed with delight at the grand display of the flaming tulip beds, and in her innocent pleasure was quite unaware of a young man who had paused outside the garden gate and was regarding her with gentle amusement.

'As happy among her flowers as she was yesterday in the dance," he was saying to himself, when she lifted her blue eyes suddenly, and met his lazy smile and lovely, brilliant eyes. She started, and colored rosily from brow to chin.

"Oh, Mr. Tempest!" she exclaimed. in a half-dismayed tone, terribly conclous of her gingham working-apron, her tumbled curis, and the broom, which she had flung down upon the steps. But Tracy Tempest did not seem to notice her confusion. He lift-ed his light summer hat from his clustering, dark curls as courteously as if little Vixen had been the senator's daughter henself, and said, smilingly:

"Mr. Arden requested me to call as I was going down town to ask if you and your sister would excuse him for deferring your sittings until tomorrow, as he had forgotten an engagement he had made several days since to go out with Mrs. Mayburn this afternoon." She said "Certainly," with a smothered sigh, and in a minute more, with his winning bow and smile, Prince Charming went on his way down the

CHAPTER IX.

But tomorrow came very soon after and the hour of noon brought Herbert Arden, accompanied by Lind-sey Greville, who had "followed a spirit in his feet" that led him straight to the presence of little Vixen, whose blue eyes had haunted him for two long days. He walked by her side to Cedarhurst, and the artist bore Lettle company. Miss Josepha shook her head disapprovingly as she watched them disappear up the sunny street.

'Lord send their giddy heads mayn't be turned by this gallavanting with these fine gents," she muttered-to nobody in particular, unless it were Vixen's white kitten that was mewing at Both girls were a little excited. They were actually going into the Tempest's great house, of whose oplendor they had heard so much and often yearned to behold. They were just a little frightened, too; for like all old houses belonging to old country families, Cedarhurst had the reputation of being haunted. The place was more than 100 years old, and one of the stone wings-the first part that had been built-had fallen into disuse, and was given over to bats and owls that inhabited the creeping ivy that grew luxuriantly all over the outside, and even flung its green arms across the broken windows of the empty The country people averred that for many years lights had been seen at night dimly visible through windows, and some who had passed close to the mansion at times swore that the pale, beautiful, anguished face of a young woman had been seen peering through the ivy wreath that overhung the window. things were retailed to the old housekeeper at Cedarhurst, she ex-plained them very simply by stating that the maidservants slept in the disused wing-a fabrication some meddlesome wight detected her in and charged her with; whereupon the old woman flew into a rage, and tartly observed that if people would mind their own business, they would have enough to do without interfering with the family at Cedarhurst.

So matters stood until this day, and the chost was fully believed in by everyone in the neighborhood. Lettie had never doubted it, and they glanced up with superstitious awe at the ivy covered west wing of the large, rambling old stone mansion as they went up the terrace steps toward Little Vixen had an honest terror of ghosts, which Lettie had often seized upon to frighten and tease her. A sudden thought came to Lettie now that made her eyes shine and her cheeks glow redly "I wish I could lock Vixen in that haunted wing," was her cruel thought. "She would be so frightened by tomorrow morning that her hair would turn white, or she would be a gibbering maniac.'

She was so angry and jealous over the girl's triumph of two days ago that the contemplation of such a terrible catastrophe actually delighted her, and she admitted a dark temptation to her mind.

They went into the house through the wide, beautiful hall, and up the broad, winding stairs to a splendid apartment filled with luxurious furniture, vases of flowers and bric-a-brac. Vixen amused herself with looking at pretty things in the room, while Arden gave Lettie the first sit-There was a small portrait of Tracy Tempest upon an easel, and Vixen's eyes turned to it again and again in shy delight at its dusky

In a very little while, it seemed to her, the antist was ready for her, and it was Lettie's turn to wait. She sat as patiently as she could while his busy pencil drew the outlines of her fair face. There was a dreamy smile of pleasure on the red lips, and a light of expectation in the large eyes. She was wondering, every moment, if the original of the picture would not stroll into the room, with his bonny smile and his bright, laughing eyes.

Since yesterday, at the gate, she had not seen him. It seemed an age! Her heart sunk strangely when the artist finished, and there was no Prince Charming yet.

Herbert Arden said, courteously: 'Mrs. Tempest wished to be here during the sittings, but she was out riding with her son when you came. If you will excuse me, Miss Lettle, and you, Miss Vixen, I will go, now, and see if she has returned.

He went out, and presently a courteous servant entered with a tray of delicate refreshments, and a message. Mrs. Tempest had not yet returned. Would they be so kind as to wait for her? Mr. Greville and Mr. Arden would be with them presently. Now was Lettie's opportunity. She scarcely tasted the luscious strawberries and golden oake, so great was her excitement, as she said with pretended carelessness:

'Vixen, if you weren't such a little coward, and so afraid of ghosts, this would be a glorious chance to do what I've always longed for-to explore the old west wing, that the folks all say is haunted by the ghost of a beautiful lady."

Vixen's blue eyes dilated wildly.
"Oh, Lettie!" she exclaimed timor-

"Oh, I knew you'd be afraid!" the brunette said, disdainfully. "I only wish it was Dolly Brown I was asking to go with me, instead of a little coward like you, Vixen Jarvis." Lettie knew that it always enraged Vixen to call her a coward and to throw into her teeth the bravery of Dolly Brown, a strong, raw-boned girl of their acquaintance who was singularly wild and fearless, and who would have liked nothing better than the escapade Lettie was proposing

Vixen sprang up, eyes blazing, cheeks glowing:

"I'm no more coward than you are, Lettie Jarvis!" she flashed, disdain-"I didn't believe you were in fully. earnest about going to the west wing. But, come on, I'll see what stuff you are made of now. I dare you to go!"
"I'll show you!" Lettle exclaimed.
She sprung up, caught Vixen's little hand in hers and whirled her out of the room; but on the way she said, with pretended alarm: "Your hand is as cold as ice; you're afraid to go! Hadn't we better turn back now? was just joking with you, Vixen!"

"No; come on! I wouldn't turn back for all the world!" Vixen answered, defiantly, just as Lettle knew she would, and they ran on without meeting any one until they had left the in-habited part of the house behind them, and were traversing the dark, draughty hall that ran out to the west wing. "Oh, what a lark! Dolly Brown would give her eyes for such an adventure!" exclaimed Lettle. "Let us go into one of those rooms and hunt

FOUR FISHERMEN DROWNED. Astoria, Ore., May 25 .- From reports received from points along the coast, it is thought that more than four lives were lost in a storm Wednesday afternoon. A gale, which suddenly sprang from the southeast, was the worst that ever prevailed on this part of the coast at this time of the year, in the history of the weather bureau. The wind reached a velocity of over 60 miles an hour. Fishermen were everywhere on the river with their nets out. The boats started for the nearest port, leav-ing their nets behind, and four men are known to have been drowned.

SUICIDE IN CENTRAL PARK. New York, May 24.-Louis Lewith, at one time a reporter on the Staats Zel-tung, of this city, shot and killed him-self in Central Park Wednesday night. He had been out of work and ill for some time. In his pocket was a memorandum asking that his body be cremated, the expenses to be paid out of a life insurance policy for $200 which he carried. The remainder of the money due on the policy is to be paid to Miss Florence E. Moore, of this city, a young woman with whom he was in love. WOMAN SUICIDES WITH A RAZOR

Philadelphia, Pa., May 25. — Mrs. Annie Chism Gilmore, wife of Major J. C. Gilmore, assistant adjutant-gen-eral of the National Guard of Pennsylvania, committed suicide in their home in Ridley Park near this city, by cutting her throat. Major Gilmore had just finished shaving himself, when his wife picked up the razor and gashed her throat, severing the jugular vein. Major Gilmore was about making preparations to have his wife treated at a sanitarium.

TEN SHOTS A SECOND

Marvelous Speed of a Rifle Invented by a Michigan Man.

Escanaba, Mich., May 23. - What is claimed to be the greatest rapid-firing rifle of the age has just been invented by "Capt. Jack" O'Connell, who makes his home at Rapid River, this county, but spends most of his time traveling about the country giving exhibitions of fancy rifle shooting. "Capt. Jack" is widely known for his skill in the use of firearms, his gun, which is a recoil operated magazine, is the result of several years' experimenting. The gun is no heavier than an ordinary hunting rifle, yet it has been fired 120 shots in 21 seconds and 400 shots within the minute by its Twenty cartridges held by their bases in clips slide through the breech of the gun, and these may be fired in one continuous stream, the report blending into a "bur-r-r," so rapidly are they discharged. Twenty consecutive shots can be fired by 10 pulls of the trigger, or all 20 may be fired with lightning rapidity by simply pulling the trigger once and holding it back. O'Connell has already given several exhibitions with his marvelous rifle, but he will not permit anyone to get near enough to examine the gun. EMBEZZLERS GO TO JAIL. Rutland, Vt., May 23.—Chas. W. Mussey pleaded guilty before Judge Wheeler in the United States district
