"Take care, old Whitey, I must step on you if you get udder my feet. There, there, blackey, get off my shoulder; you'll tear my frock. Shoo, shoo," and driving them before her with her wide-brimmed hat, Trudy reached the open door.

"It was a trim little figure, bending over the threshold with a laughing demand for corn for the chickens. Both men rose to obey her, but the elder was hastily recalled by Trudy's imperative, "No, no, Ducked Danel, I do say to him?" he added, seeing Trudy's distress. The pretty pink in her cleeks had waished and her brown eyes were full of rouble.

Mr. Darrow started forward as if to urge him, the wide-brimmed hat, "Trudy reached the open door." "Why, Trudy," began Uncle Daniel, but Trudy reached the open door.

sparkle of mischief in her eyes, "and I don't know as he ever would if you hadn't frightened me into telling him."

And then, her gentle heart pitying the disappointment of her would-be lover, she added with the prettiest little air of explaining matters, "You see, Mr. Darrow, I've an'te I, Adam?" and Trudy looked appealingly at the younger man. "There's the spare chamber, you know, that would accommodate two nicely, and Mrs. Hall said that two men wanted to come but her rooms are all taken. Don't you think, Uncle Daniel, I might try, just try? It would be so nice to have the books next winter."

Evidently Uncle Daniel did not know what to think. Divided between his aversion to having strangers around, and his desire to gratify Trudy, he could not decide at once.

A single one-sided tree struggled with the gravelly soil, and a flat ledge frock cropping out in the yard was painted with the advertises ment of a patent medicine. Pretty bad, Thought, and pretty hopeless.

The first time I saw the place was in late October, three years ago. The second time was in the following December. It looked dreamer than ever in the gray afternoon, and the gusty wind banged the shameful old blinds around as with high contempt for the house and all it had to shelter.

desire to gratify Trudy, he could not decide at once.

"Well, well child, we'll think on't—perhaps."

Even this half concession put wings to Trudy's feet. She flew upstairs to her chamber, from which she descended like a guest of summer wind, to lay the table for supper. A flutter-of blue gingham, a trill of bird song, a scurry of light feet, and supper was ready. The low sun shone straight in at the tiny-paned window and lay in long golden pools on the white floor and upon the great brown loaf on Trudy's table. The pale blossoms of the creeper
