The Star

The play not only affords him just the sort of opportunity that suits his qualifications, but it is highly ingentious, cleverly constructed and a work of art in itself. It has an abundance of merit, especially in characterization, outside of the variety of chances it throws in the way of Fairbanks. Back of it is a theme and treatment tremendously convincing, though not thrust upon the audience, the puny and futile efforts of man, "glory, jest and riddle of the world" that he is, in his struggle with relentless environ-

When Tyrone Power was playing Bassano to the "Shylock" of Sir

Henry Irving at the Lyceum Theatre in London, a few cinema shows were running in some parts of the city with admission "tuppence." If any-one had told Power then that he would become a screen actor he might have run them through with Bassanio's dagger, but nevertheless Tyrone is in the movies and in 'em right.—Oakland Observer.

Tyrone Power certainly makes the movies move. The great Slakespear-ean actor is being starred in "The Planter," a spectacular production based on Herman Whittaker's sensational southern Mexican novel. The story is full of tense situations, in which Power is given his grand op-portunity. The play ought to be an enormous hit.—Photoplayers' Review.
