Jenkins	 minuture of lard and butter is meant; if you have pure lard you can use all lard, but a small amount of butter makes a far better pastry. The French pastries are made of pure fresh butter, which accounts for their crispy flakiness. Work one-half of whatever shortening you use into the sifted flour and salt. Use the fingers tips or a flexible knife. Moisten to a dough with the cold water. Use just as little water as possible; too much water makes a hard leathery crust. Flour the pastry board and turn the mixture upon it, roll it out lightly and spread with part of the remaining butter or shortening, sprinkle flour over this and roll again, fold the sheet of pastry over once and repeat the process until you have used all the butter. Now cut off as much as is needed for one pie woll and use it; then make another. To put a pie together, roll the paste about an eighth of an inch thick and a trifle larger than the pie tin. Dust the tin with flour, lay the crust in and let it shrink and draw together all it will, lifting it from the sides and shaping it gently until it is well fitted into the pan. Trim it and pinch up the edge if it is to be an open affair. Put it into the oven and when it is partly backed, draw it out and prick the air bubbles with a sharp fork. Put the filling in at this time and return to the oven.
