

Simply Wonderful for Chest Colds Makes 'Em Well Over Night

Nothing Half So Quick to Relieve and Cure as Good Old "Nerviline."

Don't lie awake to-night coughing your throat sore—don't let our chest cold develop further—that's the way to coax on pneumonia.

Be sensible, and, as thousands before you have done, use Nerviline. It sure is a bully fine thing to knock out a cold or bad cough.

After once using Nerviline you'll swear by it for all time to come.

You'll say it's more like a miracle than anything else to feel its warm soothing action upon your tight chest. You'll be amazed at the quick way it cured your cough and broke up your bad cold.

It's safe for even a child to rub on Nerviline. Although five times more powerful than most other liniments, yet Nerviline has never yet burned or blistered the tender skin of even a child.

It's worth while to remember that wherever there is an ache or pain Nerviline will cure it.

Try it on your sore muscles, on a stiff joint, on the worst possible case of rheumatism, neuralgia, sciatica, or lumbago. These ailments Nerviline is guaranteed to cure mighty quick.

The mother of a large family can save heaps of work and worry, can cure little ills before they grow big, can keep the whole family well by always having Nerviline handy on the shelf. The large 50c. bottle is the most economical.

THE HEIR OR Lancewood

CHAPTER XXIII.

"But I see it," she said. "You are not likely to thwart me in any way, but Miss Neslie is. My woman's ways have been enough to find out a secret of yours, and I know quite well that in all little arguments, disputes, contradictions, you will naturally enough take Miss Neslie's side. Now I do not intend the serenity of my house to be disturbed by two opponents. I will not have two enemies in my house. I hope that Miss Neslie may marry, but until she does so she must, I suppose, remain here. It will be neither agreeable nor convenient for me; but I cannot help it. Whether you remain or not depends entirely on yourself."

"Will you explain, Lady Neslie?" he said, coldly. "I have not the pleasure of understanding you."

"What I mean is quite plain," replied Miladi. "Miss Neslie and I are sure to disagree; we are sure to be at daggers drawn with each other. Now, if in these disagreements you take her part, if you help her, if you assist her in despite of any wish of mine, then—understand me clearly—you must go."

"I remain," he said proudly, "by Sir Arthur's wish."

Miladi interrupted him: "That reminds me," she said amiably; "I wish to ask you why Sir Arthur desired you to remain here. Do you know?"

"I believe it was because I understand everything pertaining to the management of the estate. I know more of the details of management than did Sir Arthur himself."

"That would make you very valuable to me," she said, "if you keep your place, and do not presume to interfere."

His face flushed indignantly; he was too proud to speak.

"Has your ladyship finished?" he asked, after a moment's silence.

"Yes, that is all," she replied. Then she looked into his face, with the smile that some people thought so irresistible. "You know in your own mind," she said, "although you will not admit it to me, that you would not leave Lancewood for the whole world while Miss Neslie remains here, be wise, and be warned. I shall be glad to avail myself of your services—for I do not intend to work; all work must be done for me. I shall be glad of you to look after Lancewood if you keep to the terms I have laid down."

"I will do my duty honestly," replied Gerald.

"Yes, without doubt," said Miladi, indifferently. "I should suppose that you will allow me to remind you that there is another quality almost more essential than honesty—that is discretion. I have said all I wished to say. Good-morning, Mr. Dorman."

With a bow, and low muttered words on his lips, the secretary quitted the room. He went straight to the open window in the corridor.

"I want a breath of air," he thought, "after that. Sir Arthur, with all his good sense, has deprived his daughter of Lancewood to give it to that woman's son, that false, dainty, haughty woman. Why, she does not even know what principle means. Her words to me signify, 'I know you love Miss Neslie; but if you presume to interfere with me, you will lose the sweet pleasure of her society.' She is no more fitted to be the mistress of Lancewood than I am to be King of Spain."

He was irritated and annoyed; he had gloried in the thought that he should be a shield for Vivien, that he should take her part in every dispute, that he should serve her loyally and faithfully. Now this woman, who undoubtedly had the power in her hands took him quite calmly that if he took part against her he must go. He knew that she would keep her word if once she bade him go. How could he remain?

Once again that morning Lady Neslie sent for him—it was to ask him a question.

"I want you to tell me what that sentence in Sir Arthur's will means," she said.

"What sentence, Lady Neslie?" he asked.

"The one in which, speaking of his daughter, he says, 'I leave the honor of my house in her hands.' It was very absurd. Surely I can take as much care of the family name and family honor as she can. Do you know anything about it, Mr. Dorman?"

"No, I do not," he replied, "but I do know that when Sir Arthur lay dying, he said the same thing."

"Well, it was not very complimentary to me, was it? I am not concerned about it. Family honor and all that kind of thing, are great nonsense."

"I hope your ladyship will not teach little Sir Oswald that," observed Gerald. "Family honor stands second only to religion."

Miladi laughed with a little contempt; she always did so when religion was mentioned.

"I shall teach my son anything I like. But what I was about to say was this—that I hope Miss Neslie will not encourage any absurd ideas from that sentimental decision of Sir Arthur's. I hope it will not lead her to think that she is justified in interfering with me or my son."

"It will be better for your ladyship to discuss the matter with Miss Neslie."

"No," she said, laughingly; "I prefer to discuss it with you. Miss Neslie chills me; I never care to talk to her. If you are her true friend, as I am sure you profess to be, you will give her a hint of this."

"Even at the risk of displeasing you," said Gerald, "I must decline." Lady Neslie laughed again.

"That is a very dignified way of putting it," she said. "I suppose that, like myself, you are very much in awe of her. Well, then, between you you must keep a sharp lookout after this much-vaunted family honor." And again Gerald Dorman left her presence dumb with the force of his wrath.

"I would not serve her or hers," he said—"I would not remain here another day, but for Miss Neslie."

During the first few weeks after her father's funeral, Vivien kept almost entirely to her own room. In losing him it seemed to the desolate girl she had lost all. She could not recover from the blow. During that time she did not come into collision with Lady Neslie, and during that time she made some very firm and very noble resolves.

"The guardian of the honor of my house!" Those words were sacred to her. It seemed to her that no one had ever had so glorious a mission before. It was above all other things that which she most desired—to preserve the name and race she loved so well from evil influence. It was next best to leaving her the inheritance of Lancewood. That was left to another; to her had been left the maintenance of the family honor. "And I will keep it," she said, "unstained and unshaken."

With that object she made many fair and noble resolves; no mean failings, no small indulgence in jealousy or envy, should interfere with her lofty mission. She would devote her life to teaching and training the young heir. She would do her best to make him a good man; and, in order that she might effect this, she must be at peace with Valerie. She must humble herself to conciliate the stranger whose coming had marred her life. It cost her no small effort to make the resolve; but she had a soul of great sacrifices and noble deeds.

She would make peace with Valerie. She would go to her, and ask her to let the past be buried, to begin again a new and peaceful life. She would try to be her friend. Surely, if she could influence the mother, she might in time influence the son—and Vivien indulged in a day-dream. She saw Oswald a wise and noble man, a true, loyal Neslie, loving the name and race as she did herself. It was a dream that was never to be realized—cruel days had dawned for Lancewood.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In the interest of her half-brother, Vivien had determined to forget all past differences, and to make a friend of Lady Neslie; so one evening she said to her—

"Valerie, if you are not engaged, will you spare me a few minutes?"

"Is the lecturing business about to begin?" thought Lady Neslie. "I will have none of it."

"It is not a very usual thing for you to seek me," she replied aloud. "I am not engaged. What do you want?"

"I want you to walk out into the grounds with me. I have something to say to you."

It was an August evening, and the warm still air was heavy with the fragrance of the tall Ascension lilies. The sunbeams lingered with a golden light on the odoriferous flowers; the roses drooped their heavy heads. Earth and sky looked so fair that Valerie saw no particular reason for refusing; and Vivien led her to her own favorite nook, where the sun-dial stood and the fountains played in the sunlight.

How long was it since that sunny summer morning when she had stood there dreaming of the noble deeds she would do. She lived through the scene again. She remembered her anger, her passion and dismay, when she received her father's letter; she remembered how she had inveighed against his marriage, and how impatient, how worse than useless, all her struggles had been. How long was it since she had sat there in the sunlight?

A few years—as men count time; to her it seemed that a lifetime had passed. And now she had lost all, except the guardianship of the honor of her house. But she was there to plead with the stranger who had supplanted her.

What Are You Doing for that Eczema?

"Nothing; I've about given up trying to cure it."

"That is not wise. Do as I did and you will probably be cured in a short time. I used Zylex and Zylex Soap with it and my Eczema began to improve at once. A couple of boxes cured. You can get Zylex at your druggist's."

"Valerie," she said, "you will not misunderstand me?" But Lady Neslie interrupted her.

"Once for all, Vivien, let me tell you, I will have no interference. I am mistress of Lancewood, and I shall do what I like."

"Do not mistake me," returned Vivien; "I am not about to interfere. I have seen nothing that calls for interference. I was about to ask you, Valerie, whether we cannot be better friends."

Heaven knew the effort it cost that proud girl to humble herself so. She had so heartily despised the woman by her side.

"Let us be better friends," she begged. "We have but one interest in common—the welfare of little Oswald. If we live in peace and harmony, we can act so much better for him."

"What do you call peace and harmony?" asked Valerie, sharply.

"Never disagreeing," replied Vivien.

"I never have wanted to disagree," said Miladi. "It was you. From the very first you always disliked me, you were always jealous of me; you would have sent me away if you could."

The beautiful face flushed crimson with humiliation; but it takes more than the spiteful words of a spiteful woman to shake the resolve of a noble mind.

"There is some truth in what you say, Valerie. I did not like you. I was vexed and sorry that my father had married you. But now that he is dead and we are alone, let it be different. I offer you what I have never offered you before, my hand in true and loyal friendship. Will you accept it, Valerie? Will you let me do my best for you and for little Oswald?"

But Miladi was suspicious. She was too ignoble herself to understand a noble motive. She became suspicious. What did Vivien want? She could not, would not, believe that it was friendship with herself. She turned abruptly to her—

"What is it you want, Vivien? Speak plainly. You must have some design or motive in this—tell me what it is."

Vivien raised her patient face to the clear blue sky before she answered.

"I have no motive, Valerie, but the wish to be friends with you, the wish to help you in the training and education of your son, the wish to help you to make him a good man."

The French Government report on successful German attacks on the Heights of the Meuse, and bomb fighting at other points.

The Russian Government report the Germans repulsed in the Bialystok provinces, also further desperate fighting on the Narw and some movement between the Vistula and Bug, where the enemy concentrated massed artillery.

The Italian Government report some progress on Carso.

BONAR LAWO.

LONDON BUDGET.

LONDON, Aug. 8.

The Germans continue to make progress. Their efforts are to cut the retreat of the Russian army from the Polish salient. They have commenced an attack on the fortress of Kovno and Ostrowitz, which are among the obstacles they must overcome in order to reach the railway running from Warsaw through Pultusk and Dnestro to Petrograd. They have taken the minor fortress Serok at the junction of the Narw and Bug, and have crossed the Vistula in the vicinity of Warsaw. Further south General Woyrich is advancing eastward, but Field Marshal Mackensen is being stubbornly resisted, apparently making, at the very slow progress. On the whole the daring scheme mapped out by the Germans as the grand attempt to capture of Warsaw the destruction of the Russian army, is unfolding itself slowly as must be the case for its very magnitude. With three ways, besides those built since the war, it is believed in military circles here that the Grand Duke Nicholas will be able to extricate his Warsaw army. Events in the east, however, will continue to rivet the attention of the world on them for some time to come.

The Germans have gained successes in the Arzamas forests where the Army of the Crown Prince has been trying for some weeks to find a weak spot in the French defenses, but their effort to recross lost trenches on Lingepol in the Vosges, is declared to have cost the dearly.

There has been some rather heavy fighting in the Caucasus between the Russians and Turks, but official reports from the Caucasus are so contradictory that it is impossible to say in whose favor it is going.

There is much interest in the London negotiations in the Balkan capitals, reports from which indicate that Serbia at last, is willing to accept the Greek Government's proposal to assist, apparently making, at the very slow progress.
