the London Street

Railway Company.

Speaking of the request of the city

street at as early

a date as possible,

Thinks It Will Be Impossible to account—something it has not done for see that we can reduce the present figures by more than $1,000. It looks to me like a 231/2-mille rate."

His worship also remarked that it will be fairer to the people to name expenditures than to leave an overdraft to the council of 1906. Last year the council shirked the payment of. with the overdraft from the council questionable manner of doing business, belief that a 23-mill rate would run able to pare any appreciable amount 24 mills. It would thus have been able to pay its debt: the people would have beard is entitled to more money than known exactly where they stood and appeared, was built early in 1853. In the year 1868, the Grand Trunk pushed its line through from St. Marys and built a little station-house on the present site in East London and the freightshed on Adelaide street. These were used as the headquarters of the G. T. R. In this city for some time. About the year 1884, the G. T. R. Comaccount—something it has not done for three years and altogether I cannot Western, and its efforts were crowned with success in 1886. The Great Western then lost its identity in the G. T. R., and the downtown station became the headquarters of the latter.

And now it is an assured fact that the old station building is to disappear very soon, after doing duty so long and faithfully. The growth in the railway business, which it has seen during its life, is truly remarkable. Fifty years ago, one small engine and three cars were considered a big passenger train in the eyes of Londoners. The engines in those early days were so few in number that they were called by pet names, such as London, Hamilton, Chatham, towns through which they passed being their namesakes. One of those old machines would appear as a dwarf beside those of today, and the G. T. R passenger trains are now so long that there is scarcely any room many of them between Clarence and Richmond streets. A generation ago, the yards in front of the old station consisted of one or two tracks-and the freights were not in the way at all. In fact, the old freight cars were only built to hold ten tons, while their present-day successors carry from 30 to 40 tons. Of course, additions and renovations have been made in the old station building from time to time, as the staff of employes and the business increased. The same has been the case with the ancient freight sheds on York street. So that roughly speaking, both buildings have about twice the accommodation that they had in 1853. They are still the same "at heart," however. But there is no doubt that both will pass

We recleared farther along the line to the alized that it will reach out to a large east by the demolition of the old and growing district, and that it will roundhouse, so that if the bonded be a good thing for the citizens and the property is bought, the present G. T. R. yards between Talbot and Waterloo streets will be doubled or tripled in extent. When the Clarence street difficulty is cleared up there will thus be a great space ready for sidings and freight trains. There is scarcely any doubt that the new station will be built upon the old site, largely on account of the fact that it is at the end of the business portion of Richmone street. It is the opinion of many that since the expansion of the city, both industrially and residentially, must lito the eastward, the new depot could well be built on the present site of the
