THE TRUTH ABOUT KING EDWARD VII

Monarch "In His True Colors"
Is Book Issued In London

THE KING AND THE KAISER

Author Says There Was Permanent Breach and Antipathy Between Them—Entertaining Personal Stories of the Sovereigns

(London Chronicle).

When Sir Sidney Lee recently published his monograph upon King Edward VII, the Dictionary of National Biography certain quarters were displeased at the frankness of much of its criticism and the freedom with which the portraits of the late monarch were sketched.

Now, in "King Edward in His True Colors," issued today, Edward Legge, who is the author of "The Emperor Eugenie, 1870-1910," strictly defends the memory of the king. He shows him as an accomplished and successful diplomat, as a clever tactician, as possessing an inclination towards the study of serious literature, and as a friend staunch in adversity to those whom he admitted into his confidence. The volume is in no way sensational—as might be supposed from misreading the spirit of the title—and is not likely to excite the stir created by Sir Sidney Lee's outspoken biography, to portions of which Mr. Legge takes such exception.

The most poignant chapter deals with the relations of King Edward with the Kaiser, and reveals clearly and unambiguously the permanent breach and antipathy which existed between them. "In reality," Mr. Legge declares, "the personal relations of King and Kaiser lapsed into calm only when they were apart from one another. . . . the real situation, the eccentricity, the unaccountability of the nephew being a constant source of irritation to the long-suffering uncle."

An instance was furnished by one of the visits which the Kaiser made to this country at a moment when Queen Victoria was indisposed, and the duties of host devolved upon the Prince of Wales, as the king then was. "To the Kaiser," who was arranging the imperial tour, the prince said, in effect:—"I will do all I can to make his stay here agreeable. One condition, however, I should like to make, it is that he should not bring with him any large suite which the emperor brought with him that very man!"

Diatribe of Display

The Kaiser's inability to travel without an imposing retinue was another cause of friction. Once this entourage was so numerous that it could not be accommodated at Windsor, and some members were sent to Frogmore. There grumbled at the hospitality in letters to the Kaiser, and the complaints were repeated in the German newspapers, to the intense annoyance of King Edward, "whose reaction was the greater as the complaints were chimerical."

The uncle's conception of the essence of good breeding was continually flouted by the exuberant levity of the nephew, and, do what he would, he generally managed, quite unintentionally, to wound the younger man's boundless vanity by his own country, made a point at a dinner in Budapest of entering the room with his arm linked in that of the professor, saying:—"Ladies and gentlemen, of course you know my friend, Professor Vambéry."

On another occasion the Prince, fancying that Professor Vambéry—for whom he had a warm regard—was neglected in his own country, made a point at a dinner in Budapest of entering the room with his arm linked in that of the professor, saying:—"Ladies and gentlemen, of course you know my friend, Professor Vambéry."
