Massy said, "have now three classes of aircraft are the air ship, the aeroplane, and the scaplane mocked, and that as men sow so also The airship, as you know, derives its 'lifting power,' or sustentation, from the light hydrogen gas inclosed within one or more gas-tight bags or envelopes. If we remember that it requires about thirteen cubic feet of hydrogen-which is the lightest gas known-to lift one pound weight into the air, we can easily realize that airships, if they have to carry a numer ous crew, must of necessity be very bulky. The great size of the airship is naturally a disadvantage; and in order to be fairly safe from special artillery fire, airships must be made to travel comfortably at a height of at least 5,000 feet.

Aeroplanes and seaplanes, on the other hand, deriving their sustentation from the action of the air on their wings, can be made much smaller. more compact, and stronger than airships. Whereas a given type of airship carrying a certain load can be made to travel at greater altitudes

"The increase in the size of an air dependence fully restored to her, with solid guarantees against future in the 'dead weight' to be lifted as in the 'dead weight' to be lifted, as well as to a decrease in the strength of the construction and a greater difficulty of proper handling; while the increase in the power of the motor of an aeroplane leads, generally speaking, to a stronger construction and to a much safer machine, provided the motor is reliable and possesses sufficient flexibility, that is, capable of giving a wide range of power. These advantages of the aeroplane and o the seaplane over the airship would seem sufficient to decrease the value of the latter as a war weapon.'
