

The Klondike Nugget

TELEPHONE NUMBER 12... (Klondike Nugget details)

NOTICE... (Newspaper notice regarding advertising)

LETTERS... (Letters to the editor regarding Dawson)

MONDAY, JANUARY 6, 1912.

$50 Reward.

We will pay a reward of $50 for information that will lead to the arrest and conviction of any one stealing copies of the Daily or Semi-Weekly Nugget from business houses or private residences...

AMUSEMENTS THIS WEEK.

Auditorium Theatre - "Woman Against Woman"...

A JUST JUDGMENT.

The opinion rendered on Saturday by Judge Dugas in connection with the so-called supplementary voters' lists, affords no opportunity for adverse criticism.

That the list in question contains the names of scores of men who are not entitled to vote, is as well known to the "Kid" Committee as it is to their opponents. On this account if for no other reason it should have been disallowed.

In justification of that action the "Kid" Committee set up the plea that they were merely endeavoring to offset the alleged misdoings of the assessor in preparing the original list.

The weakness of such a plea is at once apparent. If there were irregularities in the preparation of the first list, the law provides a remedy which was available to correct every wrong which had been done.

Instead of applying the remedy which the law gave them, an effort was made to "stuff" the lists with an enormous number of names of non-voters.

The system by which the original list was prepared has nothing to commend it, as has been observed in these columns before. The ordinance should have provided for the opening of registration books and every qualified voter should have been compelled to present himself at the assessor's office and have his name recorded.

There is no desire on the part of any one, so far as the Nugget is aware, to deprive a single qualified voter of the rights he possesses under the law. The voting privilege should be protected at all hazards, and there need be no fear that such protection will be wanting.

On the other hand it may be observed that any efforts to force upon the voters' lists the names of people who are not entitled to be there will end in failure.

The incontestable claim is made for an appointed commission that it will give to Dawson a government just as efficient as can be secured through an elected mayor and council and far more economical. Dawson has reached a period in its existence when the dollars and cents must be looked at.

Chess Playing Old Crank

Who Left His Nephew a Peculiar Legacy

That for Many Years Was Looked Upon as Meaning Practically Disinheritance.

"Mate! There, I've won!" And May Patry clapped her hands with delight and, with a charming little laugh, looked roguishly across at her discomfited opponent.

"Thank you, Mr. Gibson," she answered, lightly. "But I don't believe you were really trying. Not your best, now, were you?"

"They are lovely, and you said they had a bit of a history," she went on. "I've promised to tell it to you, but you never have."

"Well, it's not much of a history after all, and it's a subject I don't often talk about. The fact is they were a legacy—and a disappointment."

They were indeed a beautiful set. They were made of the finest African ivory, red and white, and carved with exquisite perfection.

The board, too, was unique. Each of the white squares had in its center a tiny portrait of a chess celebrity, and each of the black and white squares was made up of smaller black and white squares, so as to form in itself a complete little chessboard or diagram, on which appeared either a problem or the critical position of a game won by a stroke of genius, selected from the work of the master whose portrait adorned the adjacent square.

"It had, in fact, been the perfect loveliness of the outfit as it stood in the little front room at Ivy Cottage—Mrs. Gibson's, where she and her mother were staying for a brief court holiday—that had first caught May's eye, and prompted a remark about how much she would like to learn how to play. Mrs. Gibson's son, Frank, had professed his aid, and thus had begun an acquaintance now fast developing into a higher game, in which both the players may—and thank Heaven, sometimes do—simultaneously secure a mate.

"Mrs. Farcy had that day gone to town on business, and as it was Frank's half-holiday, the suggestion to continue the chess lessons had been hailed with delight by both parties.

"A disappointment," Frank explained, smiling, "because I was led to expect a small fortune, and I got only the chess-table and men and a problem."

"Were you disinterested, then?" "Not exactly disinterested. They were not my father's, but Uncle Jeff's—Geoffrey Chechem, of Easthampton, the famous problem composer; he was my uncle, mother's only brother. He was very clever; not only in chess, for he carved these himself from his own designs.

"A thorough enthusiast himself, he was very anxious that I should be a good player too. He took lots of trouble, and taught me to play and do problems, though not like him, of course."

"Did you offend him?" asked May. "I suppose so. Or, rather, he took offense. I mean nothing wrong. You see, he was very eccentric, as so many geniuses are, especially old bachelors, like him. Good-hearted and all that, but terribly eccentric, and all that, but for what was proper, everything must be perfect—just so. And that was where the offense came in."

"I often used to go over to his place at Easthampton and stay a few days. This particular time he had just begun carving these men. So he showed me what he had done, and I admired them very much. Now, the last game I had played before I went and in it I had been fortunate enough to 'queen' a pawn before I had lost my original queen. I had been in a fix to know what to use for the second queen. So, having the point fresh in my mind, and thinking it would please the old boy's vanity to have a set more complete than any one else, I quite innocently suggested that he should make an extra queen of each color for use in such cases."

"He ignored the question, and asked in a chilling tone if I had ever seen a set with four queens."

"I admitted that I never had."

"Or draughtsmen, twenty-six to the set?"

"I could not at the moment recall that I had."

"Oh, then, perhaps, he ran on, sarcastically, 'you've seen gloves three to the pair or boots? Or a man with two wives? Or a pack of cards with eight aces? Or—'"

"As he paused I mildly suggested that I had heard of such things. That finished it. He jumped up and went on like a maniac."

"You—you—confound you, you never have!" Two wives at a time! Why, why— that proves him not a man but a maniac! Eight aces! Good heavens! Swindlers, sharpers, thieves, scoundrels! How dare you class me with scoundrels like that?"

"And did he never forgive you?" "That's the strangest part of it. After a while he cooled down and said: 'No, no, Frank, my boy, Morphy and Steinitz and Blackburne have been content to make shift with a rook upside down for a second queen, if ever they were lucky enough to need one, and I'm sure old Geoffrey Chechem can.' And afterwards he seemed just the same as ever, and as kind. We all thought he had forgotten it, until he died suddenly and his will was read. He had left me—only the chess outfit and a problem, with the stinging remark that he left them to my nephew aforesaid, can complete the set by having as many queens as he likes made to match out of his own pocket. Everything else went to a distant cousin."

"What was the problem?" May inquired.

"I'll show you." A moment later he returned with it in his hand. It was like an ordinary chess diagram, such as appear in the newspapers, only about a foot square, painted in water-color, and framed as a picture.

"You see," he said, "the only thing in which it differs from an ordinary problem is that there are no conditions—nothing to say which side has to play, or how many moves. But I soon solved it. White plays and mates in five moves, and a very poor problem it is. Not one of Uncle Jeff's best—at all, his problems have been much admired."

"Have you had the problem out of its frame?"

"I believe I was foolish enough to," he admitted, "but of course there was nothing."

Chess Playing Old Crank

Who Left His Nephew a Peculiar Legacy

That for Many Years Was Looked Upon as Meaning Practically Disinheritance.

"Mate! There, I've won!" And May Patry clapped her hands with delight and, with a charming little laugh, looked roguishly across at her discomfited opponent.

"Thank you, Mr. Gibson," she answered, lightly. "But I don't believe you were really trying. Not your best, now, were you?"

"They are lovely, and you said they had a bit of a history," she went on. "I've promised to tell it to you, but you never have."

"Well, it's not much of a history after all, and it's a subject I don't often talk about. The fact is they were a legacy—and a disappointment."

They were indeed a beautiful set. They were made of the finest African ivory, red and white, and carved with exquisite perfection.

The board, too, was unique. Each of the white squares had in its center a tiny portrait of a chess celebrity, and each of the black and white squares was made up of smaller black and white squares, so as to form in itself a complete little chessboard or diagram, on which appeared either a problem or the critical position of a game won by a stroke of genius, selected from the work of the master whose portrait adorned the adjacent square.

"It had, in fact, been the perfect loveliness of the outfit as it stood in the little front room at Ivy Cottage—Mrs. Gibson's, where she and her mother were staying for a brief court holiday—that had first caught May's eye, and prompted a remark about how much she would like to learn how to play. Mrs. Gibson's son, Frank, had professed his aid, and thus had begun an acquaintance now fast developing into a higher game, in which both the players may—and thank Heaven, sometimes do—simultaneously secure a mate.

"Mrs. Farcy had that day gone to town on business, and as it was Frank's half-holiday, the suggestion to continue the chess lessons had been hailed with delight by both parties.

"A disappointment," Frank explained, smiling, "because I was led to expect a small fortune, and I got only the chess-table and men and a problem."

"Were you disinterested, then?" "Not exactly disinterested. They were not my father's, but Uncle Jeff's—Geoffrey Chechem, of Easthampton, the famous problem composer; he was my uncle, mother's only brother. He was very clever; not only in chess, for he carved these himself from his own designs.

"A thorough enthusiast himself, he was very anxious that I should be a good player too. He took lots of trouble, and taught me to play and do problems, though not like him, of course."

"Did you offend him?" asked May. "I suppose so. Or, rather, he took offense. I mean nothing wrong. You see, he was very eccentric, as so many geniuses are, especially old bachelors, like him. Good-hearted and all that, but terribly eccentric, and all that, but for what was proper, everything must be perfect—just so. And that was where the offense came in."

"I often used to go over to his place at Easthampton and stay a few days. This particular time he had just begun carving these men. So he showed me what he had done, and I admired them very much. Now, the last game I had played before I went and in it I had been fortunate enough to 'queen' a pawn before I had lost my original queen. I had been in a fix to know what to use for the second queen. So, having the point fresh in my mind, and thinking it would please the old boy's vanity to have a set more complete than any one else, I quite innocently suggested that he should make an extra queen of each color for use in such cases."

"He ignored the question, and asked in a chilling tone if I had ever seen a set with four queens."

"I admitted that I never had."

"Or draughtsmen, twenty-six to the set?"

"I could not at the moment recall that I had."

"Oh, then, perhaps, he ran on, sarcastically, 'you've seen gloves three to the pair or boots? Or a man with two wives? Or a pack of cards with eight aces? Or—'"

"As he paused I mildly suggested that I had heard of such things. That finished it. He jumped up and went on like a maniac."

"You—you—confound you, you never have!" Two wives at a time! Why, why— that proves him not a man but a maniac! Eight aces! Good heavens! Swindlers, sharpers, thieves, scoundrels! How dare you class me with scoundrels like that?"

"And did he never forgive you?" "That's the strangest part of it. After a while he cooled down and said: 'No, no, Frank, my boy, Morphy and Steinitz and Blackburne have been content to make shift with a rook upside down for a second queen, if ever they were lucky enough to need one, and I'm sure old Geoffrey Chechem can.' And afterwards he seemed just the same as ever, and as kind. We all thought he had forgotten it, until he died suddenly and his will was read. He had left me—only the chess outfit and a problem, with the stinging remark that he left them to my nephew aforesaid, can complete the set by having as many queens as he likes made to match out of his own pocket. Everything else went to a distant cousin."

"What was the problem?" May inquired.

"I'll show you." A moment later he returned with it in his hand. It was like an ordinary chess diagram, such as appear in the newspapers, only about a foot square, painted in water-color, and framed as a picture.

"You see," he said, "the only thing in which it differs from an ordinary problem is that there are no conditions—nothing to say which side has to play, or how many moves. But I soon solved it. White plays and mates in five moves, and a very poor problem it is. Not one of Uncle Jeff's best—at all, his problems have been much admired."

"Have you had the problem out of its frame?"

"I believe I was foolish enough to," he admitted, "but of course there was nothing."

Chess Playing Old Crank

Who Left His Nephew a Peculiar Legacy

That for Many Years Was Looked Upon as Meaning Practically Disinheritance.

"Mate! There, I've won!" And May Patry clapped her hands with delight and, with a charming little laugh, looked roguishly across at her discomfited opponent.

"Thank you, Mr. Gibson," she answered, lightly. "But I don't believe you were really trying. Not your best, now, were you?"

"They are lovely, and you said they had a bit of a history," she went on. "I've promised to tell it to you, but you never have."

"Well, it's not much of a history after all, and it's a subject I don't often talk about. The fact is they were a legacy—and a disappointment."

They were indeed a beautiful set. They were made of the finest African ivory, red and white, and carved with exquisite perfection.

The board, too, was unique. Each of the white squares had in its center a tiny portrait of a chess celebrity, and each of the black and white squares was made up of smaller black and white squares, so as to form in itself a complete little chessboard or diagram, on which appeared either a problem or the critical position of a game won by a stroke of genius, selected from the work of the master whose portrait adorned the adjacent square.

"It had, in fact, been the perfect loveliness of the outfit as it stood in the little front room at Ivy Cottage—Mrs. Gibson's, where she and her mother were staying for a brief court holiday—that had first caught May's eye, and prompted a remark about how much she would like to learn how to play. Mrs. Gibson's son, Frank, had professed his aid, and thus had begun an acquaintance now fast developing into a higher game, in which both the players may—and thank Heaven, sometimes do—simultaneously secure a mate.

"Mrs. Farcy had that day gone to town on business, and as it was Frank's half-holiday, the suggestion to continue the chess lessons had been hailed with delight by both parties.

"A disappointment," Frank explained, smiling, "because I was led to expect a small fortune, and I got only the chess-table and men and a problem."

"Were you disinterested, then?" "Not exactly disinterested. They were not my father's, but Uncle Jeff's—Geoffrey Chechem, of Easthampton, the famous problem composer; he was my uncle, mother's only brother. He was very clever; not only in chess, for he carved these himself from his own designs.

"A thorough enthusiast himself, he was very anxious that I should be a good player too. He took lots of trouble, and taught me to play and do problems, though not like him, of course."

"Did you offend him?" asked May. "I suppose so. Or, rather, he took offense. I mean nothing wrong. You see, he was very eccentric, as so many geniuses are, especially old bachelors, like him. Good-hearted and all that, but terribly eccentric, and all that, but for what was proper, everything must be perfect—just so. And that was where the offense came in."

"I often used to go over to his place at Easthampton and stay a few days. This particular time he had just begun carving these men. So he showed me what he had done, and I admired them very much. Now, the last game I had played before I went and in it I had been fortunate enough to 'queen' a pawn before I had lost my original queen. I had been in a fix to know what to use for the second queen. So, having the point fresh in my mind, and thinking it would please the old boy's vanity to have a set more complete than any one else, I quite innocently suggested that he should make an extra queen of each color for use in such cases."

"He ignored the question, and asked in a chilling tone if I had ever seen a set with four queens."

"I admitted that I never had."

"Or draughtsmen, twenty-six to the set?"

"I could not at the moment recall that I had."

"Oh, then, perhaps, he ran on, sarcastically, 'you've seen gloves three to the pair or boots? Or a man with two wives? Or a pack of cards with eight aces? Or—'"

"As he paused I mildly suggested that I had heard of such things. That finished it. He jumped up and went on like a maniac."

"You—you—confound you, you never have!" Two wives at a time! Why, why— that proves him not a man but a maniac! Eight aces! Good heavens! Swindlers, sharpers, thieves, scoundrels! How dare you class me with scoundrels like that?"

"And did he never forgive you?" "That's the strangest part of it. After a while he cooled down and said: 'No, no, Frank, my boy, Morphy and Steinitz and Blackburne have been content to make shift with a rook upside down for a second queen, if ever they were lucky enough to need one, and I'm sure old Geoffrey Chechem can.' And afterwards he seemed just the same as ever, and as kind. We all thought he had forgotten it, until he died suddenly and his will was read. He had left me—only the chess outfit and a problem, with the stinging remark that he left them to my nephew aforesaid, can complete the set by having as many queens as he likes made to match out of his own pocket. Everything else went to a distant cousin."

"What was the problem?" May inquired.

"I'll show you." A moment later he returned with it in his hand. It was like an ordinary chess diagram, such as appear in the newspapers, only about a foot square, painted in water-color, and framed as a picture.

"You see," he said, "the only thing in which it differs from an ordinary problem is that there are no conditions—nothing to say which side has to play, or how many moves. But I soon solved it. White plays and mates in five moves, and a very poor problem it is. Not one of Uncle Jeff's best—at all, his problems have been much admired."

"Have you had the problem out of its frame?"

"I believe I was foolish enough to," he admitted, "but of course there was nothing."

Chess Playing Old Crank

Who Left His Nephew a Peculiar Legacy

That for Many Years Was Looked Upon as Meaning Practically Disinheritance.

"Mate! There, I've won!" And May Patry clapped her hands with delight and, with a charming little laugh, looked roguishly across at her discomfited opponent.

"Thank you, Mr. Gibson," she answered, lightly. "But I don't believe you were really trying. Not your best, now, were you?"

"They are lovely, and you said they had a bit of a history," she went on. "I've promised to tell it to you, but you never have."

"Well, it's not much of a history after all, and it's a subject I don't often talk about. The fact is they were a legacy—and a disappointment."

They were indeed a beautiful set. They were made of the finest African ivory, red and white, and carved with exquisite perfection.

The board, too, was unique. Each of the white squares had in its center a tiny portrait of a chess celebrity, and each of the black and white squares was made up of smaller black and white squares, so as to form in itself a complete little chessboard or diagram, on which appeared either a problem or the critical position of a game won by a stroke of genius, selected from the work of the master whose portrait adorned the adjacent square.

"It had, in fact, been the perfect loveliness of the outfit as it stood in the little front room at Ivy Cottage—Mrs. Gibson's, where she and her mother were staying for a brief court holiday—that had first caught May's eye, and prompted a remark about how much she would like to learn how to play. Mrs. Gibson's son, Frank, had professed his aid, and thus had begun an acquaintance now fast developing into a higher game, in which both the players may—and thank Heaven, sometimes do—simultaneously secure a mate.

"Mrs. Farcy had that day gone to town on business, and as it was Frank's half-holiday, the suggestion to continue the chess lessons had been hailed with delight by both parties.

"A disappointment," Frank explained, smiling, "because I was led to expect a small fortune, and I got only the chess-table and men and a problem."

"Were you disinterested, then?" "Not exactly disinterested. They were not my father's, but Uncle Jeff's—Geoffrey Chechem, of Easthampton, the famous problem composer; he was my uncle, mother's only brother. He was very clever; not only in chess, for he carved these himself from his own designs.

"A thorough enthusiast himself, he was very anxious that I should be a good player too. He took lots of trouble, and taught me to play and do problems, though not like him, of course."

"Did you offend him?" asked May. "I suppose so. Or, rather, he took offense. I mean nothing wrong. You see, he was very eccentric, as so many geniuses are, especially old bachelors, like him. Good-hearted and all that, but terribly eccentric, and all that, but for what was proper, everything must be perfect—just so. And that was where the offense came in."

"I often used to go over to his place at Easthampton and stay a few days. This particular time he had just begun carving these men. So he showed me what he had done, and I admired them very much. Now, the last game I had played before I went and in it I had been fortunate enough to 'queen' a pawn before I had lost my original queen. I had been in a fix to know what to use for the second queen. So, having the point fresh in my mind, and thinking it would please the old boy's vanity to have a set more complete than any one else, I quite innocently suggested that he should make an extra queen of each color for use in such cases."

"He ignored the question, and asked in a chilling tone if I had ever seen a set with four queens."

"I admitted that I never had."

"Or draughtsmen, twenty-six to the set?"

"I could not at the moment recall that I had."

"Oh, then, perhaps, he ran on, sarcastically, 'you've seen gloves three to the pair or boots? Or a man with two wives? Or a pack of cards with eight aces? Or—'"

"As he paused I mildly suggested that I had heard of such things. That finished it. He jumped up and went on like a maniac."

"You—you—confound you, you never have!" Two wives at a time! Why, why— that proves him not a man but a maniac! Eight aces! Good heavens! Swindlers, sharpers, thieves, scoundrels! How dare you class me with scoundrels like that?"

"And did he never forgive you?" "That's the strangest part of it. After a while he cooled down and said: 'No, no, Frank, my boy, Morphy and Steinitz and Blackburne have been content to make shift with a rook upside down for a second queen, if ever they were lucky enough to need one, and I'm sure old Geoffrey Chechem can.' And afterwards he seemed just the same as ever, and as kind. We all thought he had forgotten it, until he died suddenly and his will was read. He had left me—only the chess outfit and a problem, with the stinging remark that he left them to my nephew aforesaid, can complete the set by having as many queens as he likes made to match out of his own pocket. Everything else went to a distant cousin."

"What was the problem?" May inquired.

"I'll show you." A moment later he returned with it in his hand. It was like an ordinary chess diagram, such as appear in the newspapers, only about a foot square, painted in water-color, and framed as a picture.

"You see," he said, "the only thing in which it differs from an ordinary problem is that there are no conditions—nothing to say which side has to play, or how many moves. But I soon solved it. White plays and mates in five moves, and a very poor problem it is. Not one of Uncle Jeff's best—at all, his problems have been much admired."

"Have you had the problem out of its frame?"

"I believe I was foolish enough to," he admitted, "but of course there was nothing."

British "Barbarity"

How a General Wished to See and Saw "The Baby."

A Colonial trooper, serving in the Boshof district, sends to the "St. James' Gazette" the following appalling instance of British barbarity: "Our general the other day visited a farm house and interrogated the old woman in possession (who had a 10-inch waist). After some palaver the general said he must search the house for arms and ammunition. The old lady made no demur, merely requesting that her daughter, who, she said, had just been confined, should be left undisturbed in her room. But the general was too old a bird to be shamed by that kind of chaff, and said he was an old man with children of his own, and would go and see the baby. The old lady implored him not to go, as her daughter was still very ill, and ought not to be disturbed. His suspicions being more than ever aroused, he went and found in an upstairs room a young woman in bed.

Advancing to the bedside, the old ruffian in his silkiest tones inquired how the mother and babe were progressing, and asked if he might see the latter. The proud mamma replied that it was too cold to expose her offspring to his inquisitive gaze. At this point the old lady, who was dancing around in a perfect ecstasy of apprehension, remarked that the babe was very delicate and had to be kept under the bed clothes to avoid taking cold. At this the gallant general took a pace forward and pulled the bedclothes right off the bed. Lo and behold! in place of the sweet smiling cherub, there was six Mauser rifles, and several handoliers filled with cartridges. There was silence for a minute, and then the general, turning round to the old girl of the 140-inch waist, said, "I suppose you mean when your time comes, it will be a fifteen-pounder!" We would willingly (says the "St. James' Gazette") have withheld this shameful incident from publication, but candor compels us, with regret, to expose this monstrous example of British brutality.

And He Told Him. Counsel: "I insist on an answer to my question. You have told me all the conversation. I want to know everything that passed between you and Mr. Jones on the occasion to which you refer."

Reluctant Witness: "I've told you everything of any consequence." "You have told me that you said to him, 'Jones, this case will get into the court, some day.' Now, I want to know what he said in reply."

"Well, he said, 'Brown, there isn't anything in this business that I'm ashamed of, and if any snooty, little yee-hawin', four-by-six gimblet lawyer, with half a pound of brains and sixteen pounds of jaw, ever wants to know what I've been talking to you about, you can tell him the whole story.'"

Room and board, by 10th day, week or month. Copping house, 7th ave and 3rd street.

R. L. Goldberg, tailor for Hershberg, cleans, presses, repairs or dyes clothing for men and women.

Hot and cold lunch at the Bank Saloon.

A Fully Elective Mayor and Council BY THE PEOPLE AND FOR THE PEOPLE.

In addition to the above sentiments we call the attention of our friends and fellow citizens, irrespective of opinion, to the established fact that we carry in stock and offer for sale at...

WHOLESALE AND RETAIL. The most complete assortment of IMPORTED AND DOMESTIC CIGARETTES, CIGARS, Pipes and Smokers' Articles ever brought to the Yukon Territory.

AT RIGHT PRICES. ANGLO-AMERICAN COMMERCIAL CO. COL. CHAR. RESCHENBACH, Prop.

Bank Building, Opposite N. C. Co.

Regina Hotel... J. W. Wilson, Prop. and Mgr.

Dawson's Leading Hotel. American and European Plan. Cuisine Unexcelled. Newly Refitted Throughout—A Modern Improvement. Rooms and board by the day, week or month.

2nd Ave. and York St. Dawson.

PATRONS OF THE Bay City Market. An supplied with meats which for taste and nutrition are not equalled by any other market in this country. Try us and prove this assertion.

BOYSUNT & CO., Props.

AMUSEMENTS THE AUDITORIUM W. W. BITTNER, MANAGER. Ralph E. Cummings and Auditorium Stock Company. Week Monday Jan. 6. Woman Against Woman. Monday and Thursday Ladies' Night.

WINTER TIME TABLE-STAGE LINES THE ORR & TUKEY CO., Ltd. Going into effect Nov. 11, 1911 - Week Days Only. FOR GOLD RIVER AND CARIBOU via Carmack's and Dine. FOR GRAND BARRIS. FOR 25 BELOW LOWER DOMINION, Chase's, Goodhouse, via Hunker Creek, 7:30 a.m. FOR QUATTY CREEK - 3 a.m. every other day; Sunday 11:30 a.m. Sunday Service - Leave Dawson and Grand Forks at 9 a.m. and 7 p.m. ALL STAGES LEAVE OFFICE N. C. CO. BUILDING. PHONE 8. Watches set by departure and arrival of our stages.