SELECT STORY. A Life for a Love. BY L. T. MEADE.

CHAPTER XXXVIII. Cherry's hot face grew a little redder. "Like that," she said to herself.

"I want you to come back with me, father--back this very minute."

"Where to, child?" "To Commercial Road. There's to be a big meeting of the unemployed, and the Sisters and I, we was to give a supper to some of the women and children.

"Oh, if you put it in that way," needed to take off your great coat. I'll have my cloak and bonnet on again in a jiffy."

"What, child, am I to have no supper?" Poor Helps found the smell from the kitchen very appetizing.

"Afterwards, when you come back. Everything good when you come back. Now, do come. It is so important."

"Well, I'm done," she exclaimed. "See if I'll cook for nobody another time."

Ether and her father found an omnibus at the corner of their street. In a little over half-an-hour they were in Commercial Road; a few minutes later they found themselves in the large barn-like building which was devoted to this particular mission.

The ground floor consisted of one huge room, which was already packed with hungry-looking men and half-grown boys.

your face. Stand where you can look but can't be seen.

He was to give chase. Accordingly he did so. He did so warily. Dodging sometimes into the road, sometimes behind a lamp post in case the tall man should see him.

Those steps, too, the very way the man walked gave him a queer sensation. He was as poor looking a chap as Helps had ever glanced at, and yet the steps were not unknown--the figure must have haunted the little clerk in some of his dreams.

The pursuer and pursued soon found themselves in quarters altogether new to Helps. More and more equidistant grew the streets, more and more rudely grew the people.

At the close of the first address, just when a vociferous clapping was at its height, Helps observed a tall very thin man elbowing his way through the crowd.

he is still in the room." "You did not recognize him, father?"

"No, child. That is, I seem to know something about him. What ever are you driving at, Esther?"

"Nothing--nothing--nothing. Go, follow the man with the frock coat. Don't let him see you. Find out where he lives, then bring me word. Go. Go. You'll miss him if you don't."

She disappeared, flying upstairs again, light as a feather. Helps found himself impelled against his will to obey her.

Those steps, too, the very way the man walked gave him a queer sensation. He was as poor looking a chap as Helps had ever glanced at, and yet the steps were not unknown--the figure must have haunted the little clerk in some of his dreams.

She raised her head, stretching out something which was more like a claw than a hand.

"What's that noise?" she repeated. The noise had been made by Helps. It was an amazed terrified outcry when he heard the voice of the man who was bending over the girl. The man himself had observed nothing.

"You are very ill," he repeated. "You ought to be in a hospital."

"No, no, none of that," she said, clutching hold of his hand. "I have lain down to die. Let me die. I was starving--the pain was awful. Now I'm easy. Don't touch me--don't lift me; I'm easy--I'm a-going to die."

"The stranger knelt a little lower. 'I won't bust you,' he said. 'I will sit here by your side. Don't be frightened. I am going to raise your head--a little--a very little. Now it rests on my knee. That is better.'"

"Eh, you're a good man; yes, that's nice." Her breath came in great pants. Presently she began to wander.

"In that you, mother? Mother. I've been such a bad girl--bad every way. The Almighty's punishing me. I'm dying, and He's sending me to hell."

"No," said the quiet voice of the man. "No; you are the one He wants. He is seeking you."

"Eh?" she said. Once more her clouded brain cleared. "Eh, how my breath does go. I'm a-going to hell!"

"No. He has sent me to find you; you are not going there."

"How do you know?" She turned herself on high or two in her astonishment and stared up at him. Something in his face seemed to fill her with astonishment.

"Take off your hat," she said. "Are you Jesus Christ?"

It was at this juncture that Helps turned and fled. He ran as he never ran before in the whole course of his life. Nobody saw him go, and nobody obstructed him in his headlong flight.

"Bessie, is that you? My God, Bessie, I've seen a ghost!"

"No, father, no--a living man." "This is awful, child, I'm shaking all over. I'd sooner be in my grave than go through such a thing again."
