Democracy in England. The disorganization of political parties in England is an obvious fact. There is a split in the liberal camp, and in the conservative camp ditto. Nobody imagine that Mr. Gladstone or the Marquis of Hartington will endorse Mr. Chamberlain's ultra-radical policy. On the other side we see Lord Randolph Churchill in a very important position in a conservative govrnment, while leading conservative ournals are trying to "sit" on him to the best of their ability.

Splits within parties have been seen before; but seldom of so grave a nature as at present. A point to be noted is that both parties respectively are suffering from Serious internal disagreements. We see a certain effect; we may be sure that it has ; cause to match. Nor need we long debate as to what that cause is-as to what is the powerful disintegrating force that is now disorganizing both parties.

The advance of democracy in England is the great disintegrating and disorganizing sgent. It might be supposed that any advance of the democratic wave would simply be welcomed by the reformers, as a party, and resisted by the conservatives, as a party, and that between the two parties the issue would be clearly drawn. But that is not the way the thing works. Some conservatives would go half way, or even more, to meet the democracy, while some liberals would rather put on the brakes, if they could. What we see is that conservatives with a turn for culti vating the democracy, and liberals wh fear to adopt a thorough-going radical policy, are between them splitting and disorganizing both parties.

We do not need to adopt Henry George's theory of the use and ownership of land in order to accept him as a competent observer of the political situation in England. He may not be always right, but he generally has something to say that is worth noting. As a result of recent written constitution. Such an act as the Irish land act would in the United States have required a constitutional amendment, and could not have become a valid law unless demanded by an overwhelming majority of the whole people and after long delays, But in England this act, involving the most revolutionary principles became a law in a few weeks.

The great force that in England is making for change is, he says, not political discontent, but social discontent ; and this, he adds, all the tendencies of the time are contributing to increase. Meanwhile the conditions of life are growing harder, and the struggle for existence more intense. Mr. Giffen and his fellow statisticians may prove, he says, to their own satisfaction that the poor, even more than the rich, are profiting by the increasing wealth of England ; but they who are most concerned know that it is not so. "While we have been building our churches and of the Canadian Northwest, in its progress polacing ourselves with our religion, and "from savagery to civilization"-from the dreaming that the millennium dreaming that the millennium was dreaming that the millennium was coming," say the ministers of the Congre-gational union, "the poor have been growing poorer, the wretched more miserable, and the immoral more corrup." While enthusiastic conservatives and liberals are holding forth that the triumph of this or the other side means the triume. of the destruction of the Selkirk settlement of this or the other side means the healing of all disorders and the saving of the coun-try, there are gigantic social evils to be oncountered, which political partyism appears incompetent to remedy. Grip and the Montreal Witness are in agreement to this effect—that the great present want of the old reform party is to have an aim and a policy of its own. This want, it is understood, the young liberals propose to supply at an early date, and the aving down of a new course on the chart is now being proceeded with, so it is believed. We can see at least two rocks ahead, for which our ambitious young or apport and encouragement, and the

This is decidedly not what the trades' unions expected to see. The writer of a letter in an American paper was recently much struck by remark made by Dr. Newman, Speaking of the Grant family and their resources. the doctor said : "There are eight families, you see, to be supported." Now ian't that a little bit exaggerated ? The widow should be placed, beyond question, far up along the line of pecuniary ease. Well, let's see about that. I am told by Mr. Jones that the $250,000 fund is as much a $250,000 fund to-day as it ever was. That will give this good lady $15,000 a year.

Congress will anquestionably pension her, s it has the widows of all other presidents, and give her $5000 a year. The publishers of Gen. Grant's memoirs have already orders for nearly 300.000 copies, on which Mrs. Grant is to receive 75 cents each, and the large probabilities are-certainly the expectations are-that a million copies will be sold, on each of which she is to receive 75 cents. In beyond the dream of possible avarice.
