A Test of Hunger; Man Against Wolf; Man Wins

"All night he sat there, in the light of his campfire, motionless. Sometimes he could hear a snarl back in the den, but no heads showed. It grew bitter cold in spite of the fire."

(Times' Special Correspondence)

Sparta, Wis., June 28.—Owen Hughes, a veteran hunter of Monroe county, has rounded out half a century of hunting and trapping with a feat that has won the admiration of the whole La Crosse valley. He "starved out" a den of twelve wolves in a night lasting four days and four nights, and killed them when hunger finally drove them from their cave.

Hughes is one of the last of Wisconsin's picturesque woodsmen. He has never in his life done anything but hunt and trap, and says he will do nothing else until he dies.

He lives alone in a little cabin near Lafayette, on the edge of the big woods, where every night the mournful howling of wolves comes to his ears.

Hughes had already made a record when he located that last den. During the spring he had slain five dens of wolves, totalling thirty-seven heads, and bringing him more than $200 bounty money. And then, one evening in cooler, at the base of a rocky bluff, where a hunter must step cautiously for fear of rattlesnakes, he came upon a pack of wolves, old and young, and saw them sneak into a hole beneath a rock.

Many a time Hughes has followed wolves into their dens and killed them with rifle or revolver. But this hole was too small for him to enter. So he built a little fire near the entrance, and waited. He had with him, and then waited, rifle in hand, the muzzle toward the hole.

All night he sat there, in the light of his campfire. Sometimes he could hear a snarl back in the den, but no heads showed. It grew bitter cold in spite of the fire.

Dawn came, the sun rose, and Hughes got up and stretched his cramped limbs.
Wolves seldom venture forth in the morning. But he did not dare to go far away.

He waited all day, without a bite to eat, then lighted a fire again and waited the night. And again he guarded the den all night in vain.

The second day a hunter friend came along, and gave Hughes a little food.
The third day dawned, and Hughes, cold and hungry, paced up and down, always keeping an eye on the den.

The fourth day he had nothing at all to eat. It was a test of hunger now, man against wolf, and Hughes determined to starve out the wolves.

As evening came his eyes began to play him tricks from the long strain.
He saw eyes and heads where there were none, and fired once at the empty air.
Then he took a fresh grip on himself and waited.

At last a gaunt form sneaked forth and stood a moment, throwing a shadow on the rock. He fired and the form dropped and lay still. It was the she-wolf, the leader of the pack.

The hunter was sure the rest of the wolves were smaller and they would follow. He grasped a club and stood over the entrance of the den. Soon they came, one by one, and as they appeared he brought the club down, again and again, breaking the neck or back. When he ended there were eleven forms in a heap beside the gaunt she wolf.

Hughes stripped off the scalps, with both ears and upper eyelids entire, and the skin of the old wolf, and at dawn staggered into Burns with his booty.

There he got a gorgeous breakfast. Superintendent Richard Melanick certified the twelve scalps, and Hughes went to La Crosse county courthouse and collected $44 bounty money from County Clerk Jolivet, with the assurance of an equal amount from the state.

WANTED THE ANGELS
There is rather a spicy story told about a little boy one night being awakened from sleep in his nursery cot by the nurse, who said, "Oh, Johnnie, are you not proud, the angels brought your mamma a little baby brother through the night?" "Come sonnie," said the nurse, soothingly, "would you not like to see your little new brother?" "No," answered the sleepy-eyed boy, "I would rather see the angels."
