

THE LITTLE OLD SECRETARY

Continued

Kathleen's eyes were fixed upon Rose. The latter's face was pale, her hands were trembling, and she was looking at Kathleen with a look of intense interest and sympathy.

"No, mother," she exclaimed to herself, "I will do what is right, come what will of it."

Rose came toward Kathleen. She had calculated all she wanted to make the silver bracelet excel over other trinkets that would appear in Mr. Fitzgerald's drawing-room and it would only come to thirty-five shillings.

"Dear Kathleen, it was rather hard for me," she said, "to see you with your own strong wishes, and then to disappoint you."

But Rose's extreme disappointment made her unresponsive. She had attempted a refusal for the honor of the house of MacDermott and in her excitement she poured out a great deal more of sentiment than she would have allowed her young mistress even to suspect.

This unexpected revelation caused her to break in a new thought. The child started from the ground bright and intelligent. Rose was beamed with indescribable delight. But, kissing her little hand she said the word, "Rose."

"I was of no use," Rose said to her mother, "I did not know how to do it."

"Well, dear Rose, I am going to start now and I will put the two pieces of your gold here."

Kathleen ran in quickly to her own apartment, and taking out the dress and the lace, carried them at once into Rose's chamber.

"How can I be so foolish," she said to herself, "I am worse than Rose. She is disappointed out of her affection for me."

"We must not do it," she said to herself, "I am disappointed out of her affection for me."

"I am disappointed out of her affection for me," she said to herself, "I am worse than Rose. She is disappointed out of her affection for me."

"I am disappointed out of her affection for me," she said to herself, "I am worse than Rose. She is disappointed out of her affection for me."
