THE PRIDE OF LLEWELLYN

By Mrs. E. Southworth

and all glorious with rich autumnal flowers blooming and glowing in the afternoon sun. Beyond them wound the Serpentine River, and beyond that arose the Alleghany Mountains, and in the far distance towered the Peaks of Otto. Smoothed and strengthened by the peaceful beauty and majestic sublimity of the scene, Gladys sat ruminating far into the evening. She sat until the sun went down, firing the heavens and the earth with his retiring rays until the western horizon with all its broken and prismatic clouds, blazed as with a general conflagration and every mountain top and every forest tree, and every stream and river glowed ruddy red beneath the glare. She sat until all this gorgeousness of coloring faded out and the moon, whose silver gilding all the scene, until all that had lately flashed like rubies in the sun, now mildly beamed like pearls beneath the moon.

And still Gladys sat there, while her room grew dark. She did not bring for lights. She dreaded another interview with her aunt, she dreaded another outbreak of her own arrogance, and she resolved to remain quiet as long as circumstances would permit her to continue so. In truth Gladys had a good deal to contend with—not only of external wrongs, but of evils in her own nature. She had come of a proud passionate overbearing race, who in their old ancestral country had been lords of the soil and masters of many vassals.

It is said that we know not of what spirit we are. Certainly Gladys never knew until this day what spirit she was of. Never in her life before having been subjected to insult, she never knew the murderous wrath that lay latent in her own soul. And now that it had broken out and shown itself to her in its hideous destructiveness, she was appalled.

"Oh, Heaven! I am no better, not a whit better than the man who suffers death by law for their crimes!" she said to herself with a shudder. While she sat thus, she heard the key turned in the lock and looking up, saw Mrs. Llewellyn enter the room, followed by Bessy, bearing a tray with tea and cakes.

Now, apparently, Mrs. Llewellyn herself had regretted her harshness to Gladys, not because of its unkindness, but because of its bad policy. For certainly it was her desire to retain the affection of this girl whom she wished to bend to her will. And to do this she must govern her as gently as possible. These considerations were not, however, strong enough to induce her to make any apology to Gladys, but only to modify her manner to the poor girl.

"Draw that stand up to the side of Miss Llewellyn's chair, and set the tea tray on it. And then leave the room," said the lady to the servant. And when this order was obeyed and Bessy had left the room, Mrs. Llewellyn carefully looked the door behind her, and then seating herself beside her ward said, in a grave and not unkind tone:

"Gladys, while you take your tea, I will tell you the reasons that have induced me to say so compellingly to me, unwillingly, to subject you to this temporary restraint."

"I should be glad to know them, madam," said the young girl. "And I hope that you will listen to them without giving way to the unbecoming anger that betrayed you into much injustice, not to say gross impropriety, of word and manner toward myself."

Gladys glanced up at the pictured face over the mantelpiece, and answered: "For all the wrong that I may have been led into, Aunt Llewellyn, I beg your pardon, and that of the Lord. I always knew that anger was sinful, but when I think of our Saviour's example of patience, I feel that it is inexcusable."

"I am glad to hear you say so. Now drink your tea, while I tell you why I deem it right to keep you under some temporary restraint. At these last words the girl's cheeks flushed and her eyes flashed again, but she controlled herself and remained silent, while Mrs. Llewellyn proceeded:

"Gladys, I beg by saying to you that I stand in the relation of a parent toward you during your minority. I consider that relation a holy trust, which I have not betrayed, although you have charged me with having done so."

"I beg your pardon if I have wronged you, Aunt Llewellyn." "That is understood. Holding the relation I do toward you, and feeling a deep responsibility for the trust I must consider your welfare and happiness the paramount objects of my life. To secure these objects I must separate you from that dangerous young man whose influence over you I have every reason to dread. The only way in which I can do this is to seclude you in your own room during the stay of this young man in the neighborhood. In doing this, I am sure I do but carry out the views and intentions of your father. I shall make this transient seclusion as happy as the circumstances permit. You shall have your music, books, birds, flowers—in short, all that you require for instruction or amusement removed into this room. And as soon as I feel assured that Arthur Powis has rejoined his ship, your restraint shall be at an end. Now, Gladys, I hope that you understand me?"

"I think I do, Aunt Llewellyn." "And I trust that you will submit cheerfully to this arrangement."

A VETERAN G. T. R. ENGINEER RETIRED

"Few old employees of the Grand Trunk Railway are more liked, or have put in more years of useful service than Mr. J. S. Johnson, who just recently relieved himself of the duties of engineer on the Galt and Elgin branch."

Mr. Johnson was in continuous service on the Grand Trunk for forty-five years, a valued employee of the Motor Power Department. He started in Brantford in 1875, removing to Stratford in 1879 when the old Buffalo and Lake Huron terminal at Brantford was closed. After running over about all the lines west of Toronto between the years 1875 and 1889, Mr. Johnson took the position of engineer on the Galt branch, becoming one of the best known and most popular of the Company's staff in this section.

It is to his credit that he never had an accident that caused a loss of life. His fellow employees had the utmost confidence in him, as evidenced by the fact that for twenty years he represented the men of this district before the Executive Officers of the Company. Mr. Johnson has been ill for the past three months, but has so far recovered that in company with Mrs. Johnson he will go to the Pacific coast for the winter. —From the Galt Reporter.

Word was received at Halifax that the Greek steamer Plata was driven ashore at Sable Island and will likely prove a total loss.

The meat market at Digby, N. S., was swept off its foundation by the recent high tide and heavy seas, and is a total loss.
