Israel in 1979: on the threshold of peace

Adam Singer

For the first time in the past 20 years, Israel and Egypt are on the threshold of arriving at a peaceful resolution of their long bitter conflict, an Israeli officer said at a forum in Ottawa on Wednesday. But Lt. Colonel Akiva Dan said that the signing of a final peace treaty continues to be frustratingly elusive. Dan told the fifty-odd members that there remain four unresolved points of contention between the two parties. They Article 6 of the Camp David accords state that, in case of war between Israel and other Arab States, Egypt must give priority to its treaty with Israel over any other agreements.

Lt. Col. Akiva Dan

originally accepted this position, but reversed its position after Camp David, and refused to accept it. Egypt wants Israel to establish a specific timetable for withdrawal from the West Bank. Israel flatly rejects this demand. Israel wants immediate exchange of ambassadors once a peace treaty is signed, but Egypt refuses until West Bank Palestinians achieve autonomy. Egypt requires "re-examination" of the treaty after five years, at which time it may choose to annul it. Israel strongly opposes this.

Dan said the Israeli government does not oppose self-rule for the West Bank Palestinians, as long as Israel retains control of military security for the region. This is necessary, he said, because a totally independent West Bank state would probably have a pro-Soviet, anti-Israel stance, and Israel would be extremely vulnerable to attack—Tel Aviv is only twelve miles from the border.

Reiterating the official line of the Israeli government, Dan stated that "everything is negotiable," including Jerusalem and the West Bank. When pressed to explain what "everything is negotiable" actually means (eg. whether Jerusalem could conceivably be returned to Arab control, or the West Bank made totally independent); however, Dan was unable to elaborate.

"All Israel wants is a real and lasting peace," Dan said. "Our only concern is to have security arrangements to allow Israel to defend itself."
