I know 'tis late, but let me stay,
For night is tenderer than day;
For night is tenderer than day;
Dear love, sweet love, I cannot go;
Dear love, sweet love, I love thee so.
The birds are in the trees salesp,
The woodbine breathes a fragrance rare
To please the dewy, languid air,
The fireflies twinkle in the vale,
Ter river shines in moonlight pale.
See, yon bright star; choose it for thise
And call its near companion mine;
See, yon dim cloud above the moon,
"Twill veil her radiash beauty soon;
And look! a meteor's dreamy light
Streams mystic through the solemn night
Ah, life glides swiftly like that still fire.
How soon our gleams of joy expire!
Who can be sure the present kiss
I know 'tis late, dear love, I know;
Dear love, sweet love, I love thee so. I know 'tis late, but let me stay,

It cannot be the stealthy day
That turns the orient darkness gray;
Heardst thou? I thought I faintly hear
Vague twitters of some wakeful bird.
Nay, 'was but Summer in her sleep
Low nurmuring from the leafy deep.
Fantastic filst obscurely fills
The hollows of Kentucky hills.
The wings of night are swift, indeed;
Why makes the jealous morn such speed
This rose thou wearst may I not take
For passionate remembrance sake?
Press with thy lips its crimson heart,
Yes, blushing rose, we must depart.
A rose cannot return a kiss—
I pay its due with this, and this.
The stars grow fairer, they soon will die
But love fades not nor fails. Good-by!
Unhappy joy—delicious pain—
We part in love, we meet agais.
Good-by—the morning dawns; I go;
Dear love, sweet love, I love thee so.

Jack's Great Peril.

CONTINUED.

With what had already gone before, this put the finishing touch on glance that there was nothing tack's measures of mind. It was dangerous about her now—those Jack's uneasiness of mind. It was not, as he said, the mere presence Except for a slight wound on the of the woman, or the revelation temple, whence a little blood had which his joke had elicited, which trickled, and the distorted but now cared him, though the circumstance in itself might be unpleasant enough. So lately at his threat, she looked the woman, or the revelation scared him, though the circumstance in itself might be unpleasant enough. "I should have faced it right as calm and uninjured as is she were way from the first as any man would have done, had it net been would have done had a would have done had it net been would have done had a would have a would have a would have a would ha for the remarkable influence her face and look had upon me; that unac-countable feeling that she was no stranger to me, it was, that unnerv-

But ere his hand had reached the cord, she had seized him round the waist with one arm as with the grip of a vise, and at the same instant he felt one of those terrible hands at his throat. Every effort to release himself was fruitless; her strength seemed superbuman, and as far beyond him as was her stature. Her face glowered close down upon her now, still ered close down upon her now, still with the same fell expression.

"The only thing I could have done," went on Jack, in describing the scene to me—and just here he shall speak for himself—"the only means by which I might perhaps have made her relax her hold would have been by aiming one or two tre mendous blows with my right fis (which was at liberty) at her face. Had it been a man's, there would have been no hesitation; had it been my hand against it, and, as my arm swung up with the first impulse to my hand against it, and, as my arm swung up with the first impulse to deal her a blow, it fell helpless by my side. Vain were my efforts to get her band away from my threat there was a terrible awaying threat there was a terrible awaying a startling coincidence; that was

Jack's ille alone was in dauger, when, lo! by one of those marvellous coincidences which do happen at times in the supreme moments of existence, the rescue came, but at the cost of many a life, which but just before would have seemed worth treble the price of Jack's.

Why run the risk of clouding for life that bright and happy temperature. He was only four years old when the dreadful business happened. Hence he had scarcely known a mother's care; she was lost to him and to the world as completely as if she had died. Nay, death world have been a more by the com-of Jack's.

At the very instant that his might have depended upon another tight coing grip or two from the hand of a maniac a frightful catastrophe occurred on the train. The tire of an engine-wheel broke and a half dozen carriages were hurled down a steep embankment. The scene that the series of the same of the series of the series of the same of the series of the series of the series of the same of the series of the series of the series of the series of the same of the series of the series of the series of the same of the series of the series of the same of the series of the series of the same of the same of the series of the same of t

But what followed it was that which caused the suffering that wrought the terrible change in Jack.

In the darkness of that soft Autumn night he strove, foremost smong those who had been spared, to render such help as was possible to the less fortunate. When the official assistance came, and fires were set blezing to give light almost the first same and seak the first care was to try and seek out his dangerous fellow-traveller. In the confusion nobody was prepar-ed, of course, to listen to Jack's account of her, even had he been pro-pared then to give it. She was not, from earth. A beautiful rosebud of

At length, as a sickly dawn was beginning to make the search easier, he endeavored to discover the spot where the carriage he had occupied had fallen, and to retrace his steps (quite to the rear of the train, by the way) to the place where he tound himself lying after the catastrophe.

And here, after a lapse of twenty years—was the climax and end of the tragedy, as dreadful as anything that had gone before. The order for release, when it came, brought with it as much suffering (to all but one) as had the order for captivity. No wonder Jack was an altered man.
