is somewhat surprising that na-vards has produced no legend the "Angels of Men's" type. The man is still superstitious, and loss of a black cat is considered omnibus omen for the whole ship. at the Admiral's table the accidental ringing of a tumbler is instantly muffled, for the sound is supposed to portend early death by drowning.

However, the navy possesses a of ships that are haunted, and many serving in them are-by no means sceptical about their ghostly shipmates. Strangely enough, shipmates are rarely seen; they are generally heard or felt only, and there ways an unpleasant occurrence rise to spirit manifestation on

There is, however, one war occurrence that is still wrapped in mystery. In 1917 a convoy of twelve was on passage, when at dawn the day after sailing the escort commander discovered thirteen ships in his charge. While the identity the extra ship was being discus-ed the convoy was suddenly attacked by German light cruisers, and of the escort and nine of the squadron were sunk. The Ger-men then made off.

Observers who witnessed the whole proceedings positively assert that there were thirteen ships, and that mysterious vessel disappeared as completely as she had appeared; that she was not sunk is certain. Official reports failed to throw any light on nature of this vessel, it was ascertained that she could not have been a German raider, and her presence was "logged" by the escort commander.

She was Vanderdecken, the Dutch captain, who in the "Flying Dutchman" wished to witness the destruction of his old enemies, the English.
